* The pursuer's answer to this passage was as follows :—"With regard to the alleged admissions of counsel founded upon in it, the pursuer has no knowledge whatever, except that he never gave any counsel authority to admit that consummation had not taken place. He believes that his counsel admitted no more than that consummation was no part of the case which they were then pleading, it never having been made so by competent averment in the original summons, and no proof being led, or being capable of being competently led, in support of it. The admissions of counsel were never intended to do, and did not do, more than explain the limits of their argument, otherwise they would have been reduced to writing, and made part of the records of the Court. The pursuer was not present at the debate in the Inner-House. The pursuer believes and avers that his counsel rested his case entirely on the written documents as being evidence of ipsum matrimonium. All his counsel, from first to last, objected to make consummation any part of the case, because it was unnecessary, and because it appeared to them to be uselessly prejudicial to the defender's character, and therefore to the pursuer himself, she being his wife. What are, or may

No. 147.
June 28, 1876.
Lockyer v. Ferryman, &c.

Pleaded for the pursuer, in addition to the pleas in support of the conclusion for declarator of marriage;—3. The decrees ought to be reduced, in respect that they were obtained by and through the fraud of the late Janet Sinclair or Lockyer and others. 4. The said decrees ought to be reduced, in respect that they were obtained and pronounced upon the evidence of witnesses who gave false evidence wilfully, and who were suborned to commit perjury by the said Janet Sinclair or Lockyer and others. 5. New evidence being now available to the pursuer not at the date of the previous action known to exist, or not procurable, and sufficient to prove the existence of his marriage, he is entitled to sue and obtain decree in the present action of declarator. 6. The trust-disposition and deed of settlement executed by the said Janet Sinclair or Lockyer ought to be reduced and set aside, as (1) she was a married woman at the time, and executed the said deed without her husband's consent, and (2) had by her previous contract of marriage effectually conveyed to her husband, in the event of his survivance without issue, all right and title to the subjects and others conveyed by the said trust-disposition. 8. The decree in the former action having been obtained by the defender therein by fraud and subornation of perjury, the pursuer is entitled to reduce the same, notwithstanding the expiry of year and day from date thereof. 9. The plea of res judicata stated against the present action is untenable, because the decree was obtained by the defender in the former action (1) by subornation of perjury; and (2) because the matters of fact alleged in the present action have been emergent since the said decree, and have come to the pursuer's knowledge thereafter; and (3) because the present action is founded upon different media concludendi from those proponed in the former action.

Pleaded for the defenders;—1. The defenders are not bound to satisfy the production, and the action ought to be dismissed, in respect that this action was not raised, and that no action of reduction of the said decree of absolvitor was raised, within year and day of the date of the decree. 4. The pursuer's statements are not relevant or sufficient in law to support the conclusions of the summons. 5. The action is excluded exceptione rei judicatæ. 6. The action is also excluded by mora, taciturnity, and acquiescence.

On 15th February 1876 the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"In the first place, Finds that the alleged marriage betwixt the pursuer and the now deceased Miss Janet Sinclair Traill Sinclair, sought to be declared in the present action, was the subject of a former action of declarator against her at the instance of the pursuer; that both the grounds on which the declaratory conclusion of the present action is rested—that is to say, the interchange of matrimonial consent de præsenti and promise subsequente copula—were grounds set forth on record, and upon which parties joined issue in the former action; and that from this last mentioned action the said Janet Sinclair Traill Sinclair was assoilzied by the sentence or decree set forth on the record in the present action: Therefore sustains the fifth plea in law for the defenders in the present action. In the second place, Finds that more than year and day has elapsed since the said sentence or decree of absolvitor was given or pro-seem to be, set forth as admissions on the part of the pursuer were not made in point of fact, and the statement that they were so made in the interlocutor was entirely unwarranted by anything which the pursuer's counsel said. The pursuer was not asked, nor was his counsel, to give in any minute of admissions, and the case was left for the decision of the Court solely upon the evidence in process."

---

No. 147.

June 28, 1876.
Lockyer v. Ferryman, &c.

nounced, and consequently that, by virtue of the Instructions to Commissaries, A.D. 1563 (art. 20), and the relative Act of Ratification, 1592, c. 64, reduction of said sentence or decree is now excluded: Therefore sustains the first plea in law for the defenders in the present action. In the third place, and separatim, Finds that the pursuer's statements on record are not relevant or sufficient in law to support the reductive conclusion of the summons in the present action, by which the pursuer seeks to have the said sentence or decree of absolvitor reduced: Therefore sustains the fourth plea in law for the present defenders. And in the fourth place, Finds that the pursuer's title to challenge the trust-disposition and settlement of the said deceased Miss Janet Sinclair Traill Sinclair, and relative writs specified in the summons, is based on the contingency of his success in the conclusion for declarator of marriage, and that it cannot be sustained, seeing the defenders are now to be assoilzied: Therefore sustains the third plea in law for the defenders in the present action. For these reasons, assoilzies the defenders simpliciter from the haill conclusions of the summons, and decerns: Finds the pursuer entitled to the expenses of discussing the preliminary defences, and modifies these expenses to the sum of ten guineas: Quoad ultra, finds the defenders entitled to the other expenses of process: Allows an account of these expenses, in which credit shall be given to the pursuer for the said ten guineas, to be lodged by the defenders, and remits," &c.*

* "NOTE.—This action has been raised by Mr Lockyer, the pursuer, against the defenders, the testamentary trustees of the late Miss Sinclair of Freswick, to have declared a marriage betwixt him and Miss Sinclair, and to vindicate rights which, on the assumption of the alleged marriage, are said to belong to the pursuer, as the survivor of the spouses. The fact is, however, that this same marriage, upon the reality of which the pursuer still insists, was the subject of an action of declarator raised more than thirty years ago by the pursuer against Miss Sinclair herself, and from which, after issue had been joined and proof led, she was assoilzied. For more than twenty years this judgment was considered to be decisive, but the time came when Miss Sinclair died. The idea of a new attempt to make out what formerly could not be established then occurred to the pursuer, and the result was the institution last autumn of the present action. These particulars explain why it is that this summons contains not only a declaratory, but reductive conclusions. Before the pursuer can render available both grounds upon which the conclusion of declarator is laid, assuming that he can succeed in either, he must set aside the decree of absolvitor in favour of Miss Sinclair formerly pronounced. Hence that decree is now challenged. The testamentary disposition executed by Miss Sinclair, in the belief that she was a single woman, and left at her death for the regulation of her succession, is also challenged, and the ground on which it is impugned is, that it is, as is said, inconsistent with rights to which the pursuer may lay claim, should the alleged marriage be declared. But as to this last conclusion nothing requires to be said in addition to this explanation. It is based on an assumption which, as the Lord Ordinary thinks, cannot be realised, and so it falls, because there is not in the pursuer a title on which it can be maintained.

"I. The first of the pleas of parties which it is necessary to consider is the defenders' fifth plea, which is, that 'the action is excluded exceptione rei judicatæ.' The defenders under this plea contend not merely that the conclusion for declarator now insisted in is the same as that from which in the former action Miss Sinclair was assoilzied, but that both the grounds on which that condescendence is now rested were grounds also to be found in the former action. These grounds are (1) the interchange of matrimonial consent de præsenti, and (2) promise, followed by copula. The pursuer admits that the first of these grounds was in the first action; the second, he contends, was not in that cause a ground of action. The consequence is, that, before the comprehension or sweep of the defenders' pleas can be ascertained, it is necessary to determine whether

No. 147.
June 28, 1876.
Lockyer v. Ferryman, &c.

The pursuer reclaimed.

Argued for him;—

I. This action was not excluded by the exception rei judicatæ, for two promise cum copula was or was not within the former action. Two things which must be considered in disposing of this action are uncontested. The pursuer, on the one hand, admits that promise cum copula was on the record. The defenders, on the other hand, admit that it was not disclosed in the summons. If, therefore, its appearance in the summons was essential, it cannot be held that both the grounds on which the present declaratory conclusion is based were in the other action, in the technical acceptation of that expression, while the opposite view leads as certainly to the opposite conclusion. The Lord Ordinary thinks that the appearance of the averment and the relative plea on the record was, in the circumstances, all that was required. That the introduction of the new ground, as leave to amend the summons had neither been asked nor given, might have been opposed, and probably with success, by the defender, may be allowed. But what the pursuer did was not opposed. On the contrary, it was acquiesced in. Parties consequently joined issue upon all that was in the record, and of all, so far as averments were concerned, a proof was allowed. This, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, is sufficient to bar the pursuer from pleading the alleged incompetency of the procedure by which the grounds of action were enlarged. He might have benefited, and undoubtedly he hoped to benefit, by the change, and he exposed his adversary to a new hazard. The consequence is, that, as he took the advantage at the time, he must be content to bear now the concomitant disadvantage of the course which he pursued.

"The pursuer seeks to avoid this result by urging (1) that the proof which was allowed was not led, and (2) that the new ground of action was not in the end made a ground of judgment. On the first of these considerations all that the Lord Ordinary will say is, that the opportunity for adducing evidence was afforded, and his failure to improve it cannot circumscribe the area which his proof, had it been led, might have covered. As to the second, if the promise cum copula was on the record upon which issue was joined, the accident that the case was so presented in the end by the pursuer as to leave only the alleged interchange of matrimonial consent de præsenti for judicial determination, does not limit the comprehension or the effect of the decree of absolvitor which was pronounced.

"Dallas v. Mann, 14th June 1853, 15 D. 746, was referred to by the pursuer as an authority by which he was supported in the contention now under consideration. The Lord Ordinary, however, thinks it inapplicable to the circumstances of the present case. There, all questions in the original cause were still open, and the position of parties with reference to the point now raised was the antithesis of that which the pursuer and defenders now occupy. In Dallas v. Mann the objection to competency was not raised by the pursuer. On the contrary, after being suggested by the Court, it was adopted by the defender, and thereby became his objection. The personal bar here existing was therefore not raised, and consequently the Court was left free to dispose of the point in the way in which it was decided.

"II. But, assuming that the plea of res judicata is valid, with reference not to one merely, but to both grounds on which the alleged marriage is now sought to be declared, the sentence or decree relied on may nevertheless be impugned. Even decrees in foro may be reduced, and the next question is, whether that by which Miss Sinclair was assoilzied can in the present action be impeached? The defenders plead that it cannot, because, as set forth in their first plea, more than year and day has elapsed since the decree was given, and in their fourth plea that 'the statements of the pursuer are not relevant or sufficient in law to support the conclusions of the summons.' These questions will now be considered.

"In the first place, is the first of these pleas of the defenders well founded? The pursuer says it is not, and he so contends, because, as he says, there is no finality in a judgment finding against a marriage. The favour to marriage in his view is so great that any number of opportunities of proving it, whatever reasons: 1st, by the rule of the canon law—which had been adopted into the law of Scotland—sententia lata contra matrimonium nunquam transit in rem judicatam—the interval between them, may be allowed. This is rather a startling doctrine. It seems strange, and though many strange things are true, this, the Lord Ordinary thinks, is not one of the number. The most anomalous results might flow from its recognition. What would have happened had Miss Sinclair married after being assoilzied, and been the mother of children? Would this marriage have been a nullity, and her children declared bastards? This result would be a serious commentary on a doctrine whose only claim to recognition is that it favours marriage. The canonists are said to sanction it, and there seems to be authority for this, and perhaps for something more, in the opinion of Lord Medwyn, to be found in the report Norris v. Gilchrist, 14th January 1847, 9 D. 466. The passage referred to is at p. 483. Lord Medwyn undoubtedly is in such a question to be regarded with great respect, but his authority is not conclusive. Be it that the rule of the canon law was what he represents, by what is it proved that this rule is now the law of Scotland? Res judicata is, as the Lord Ordinary understands, a plea for which foundation may be afforded by decrees as well in consistorial as in other actions. Nor is there any distinction betwixt decrees declaring a marriage and those by which an alleged marriage is negatived. One rule applies to all classes of actions, and to all judgments, whatever their effects on the pretensions either of pursuer or of defender. Menzies v. Menzies, 14 S. p. 47, is warrant for this proposition, and the judgment in Longworth v. Yelverton, 10th March 1865, 3 Macph. p. 601, and H. of L. 30th July 1867, 5 Macph. p. 144, particularly when read in the light of the opinions delivered, cannot be reconciled with the idea that a sentence assoilzieing a defender from a conclusion by which an alleged marriage is sought to be declared is one in aid of which, when impugned, the plea of res judicata may not by the law of Scotland be invoked and sustained.

"Putting aside, then, the doctrine that there is no finality for a judgment of absolvitor from an action of declarator of marriage, what has next to be considered is, whether year and day is the period within which a challenge of such sentence as that by which Miss Sinclair was assoilzied must be instituted. This also was the subject of a very learned argument. The practice prior to the Reformation, and that by which the Reformation was followed in the Consistorial Courts, were referred to for the purpose of suggesting that the Instructions to Commissaries given in 1563 did not apply to such a judgment as that challenged. These Instructions (par. 20) will be found in Balfour's Practicks, p. 659, and the Act of 1592, c. 64, by which these were confirmed, at p. 676 of the same work. The Lord Ordinary thinks it unnecessary to say more upon this point than that it has been settled by the decision in Menzies v. Menzies, 21st Nov. 1835, 14 S. p. 47, and by the cases cited on p. 49 of the report. Guided by these authorities, he has sustained the first plea for the defenders, which is a plea rested on these instructions.

"III. If the challenge of the former decree be excluded by lapse of time, it is immaterial whether the statements of the pursuer would or would not be relevant or sufficient as grounds of reduction. But a plea against the relevancy has been stated, and upon this plea the Lord Ordinary has thought it right to give his decision. The only reasons which appear to the Lord Ordinary worthy of consideration are the alleged perjury of witnesses who were examined in the former action, and the alleged subornation of these witnesses by the late Miss Sinclair, the defender in that action. The libelling of these charges was sharply criticised by the defenders' counsel, for the purpose of shewing that it was less full in some things than in the circumstances should be required. This objection the Lord Ordinary would hesitate to entertain, and the truth is, that the entertaining of it would seemingly be of small advantage to the defenders, because the particulars desiderated would probably be supplied. That upon which he has proceeded in holding the statements of the pursuer irrelevant or insufficient is the single consideration that the alternative presented in the 12th art. of the condescendence, and in the first plea in law for the pursuer, is incon-

No. 147. June 28, 1876. Lockyer v. Ferryman, &c.

in rem judicatam; and, 2d, the ground of action in this case was different from that in the former one. (1) There was no doubt that it was the rule of the canon law that decrees against marriage could not become final, but were liable to be opened up at any time.[1] This rule was adopted in Scotland at the time of the Reformation. The whole canon law, so far as not inconsistent with the new state of affairs, became part of our consistorial law, and was acted upon in various cases.[2] That this was so was evident from the dicta of eminent Judges in some well-known cases.[3] Sir Thomas Craig, who was a great consistorial lawyer, was of opinion that the canon law was the law of Scotland.[4] This being so, it fell upon the defenders to shew that the law had been altered with regard to res judicata. (2) Again, res judicata never applied to an action based upon different grounds. The ground of action in the former case had been expressly narrowed to de præsenti acknowledgments having constituted a marriage, while this action was based on promises subsequente copula. Moreover, it would have been incompetent to have led evidence as to the alleged copula, as the averment as to it was not in the original summons, but was only added on revisal, and it had been held that a new ground of action imported into a record which had not been in the original summons could not be remitted to probation.[5] Even if it had been competent, the pursuer was sistent with that unconditional and absolute allegation of perjury which is indispensable to the relevant libelling of such a case. The idea that a pursuer may charge perjury in so far as witnesses have deponed to facts adverse to the constitution of a marriage contracted by the interchange of de præsenti consent, and in the same summons bring forward another ground of action, involving the implication that there was no de præsenti contract, and therefore that the things as to which the witnesses are charged with perjury are things upon which they may have spoken the truth, is one that, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, must be discountenanced and repudiated. And the plea of irrelevancy or insufficiency has, as a consequence, been sustained.

---

"IV. The only other plea upon which it is necessary to say a word is that urged against the title of the pursuer to insist in the conclusions of the summons. The meaning of this plea, as understood by the Lord Ordinary, is, that the testamentary deeds of the late Miss Sinclair cannot be challenged, because the pursuer never was her husband, and consequently has not the patrimonial rights, the vindication of which is the ultimate, or perhaps, in a sense, the primary, purpose of the present action. Reading it in this way, this plea has also been sustained. The result naturally, or indeed necessarily, flows from the preceding findings in the interlocutor, by which the pursuer's failure to make good the grounds of his declaratory conclusion is established."

[1] Decretals of Gregory IX., b. ii. tit. 27, cap. 7, and ibid. tit. 28, caps. 5 and 20; Sanchez, De Sancto Matrimonio, b. vii. disp. 100, sec. 14; Brückner, Decis. Jur. Matri. p. 461, sec. 66; Burge, Com. on Internat. Law, vol. i. 183; Shelford on Mar. and Div. 474; Poynter on Mar. and Div. 157; Lancelotus, Inst. Juris. Canon. b. iii. tit. 15, sec. 16; Bowzer v. Ricketts, March 3, 1795, 1 Hagg. Consist. Rep. 213; The Queen v. Millis, March 29, 1844, 10 Clark and Finelly, 534, see p. 722.

[2] Collection of Decisions in vol. iii. of Miscellanies of the Maitland Club; Statuta Eccles. Scotic. i. 176; Riddell's Peerage and Consist. Law, 447, et seq. and 473, note; Liber Officialis Sanctæ Andreæ, pub. by Bannatyne Club; Fraser, on Par. and Child, 2d ed. p. 22; Balfour's Practicks, 670.

[3] Dalrymple v. Dalrymple, July 16, 1811, 2 Hagg. Consist. Reps. 54, Lord Stowell, p. 81; M'Adam v. Walker, March 4, 1807, Mor. App. voce Proof, No. 4, H. of L., May 24, 1813, 1 Dow, App. 148, Lord Eldon, p. 181; Morris v. Marshall, Jan. 14, 1847, 9 D. 466, 19 Scot. Jur. 154; Brymer v. Riddell, 1811, contained in Bell's rep. of a putative marriage; Officers of State v. Alexander, May 25, 1866, 4 Macph. 741, 38 Scot. Jur. 389.

[4] Jus Feudale, i. 3, 24, ii. 18, 17, and 21; Stair, i. 1, 14-16.

[5] Dallas v. Mann, June 14, 1853, 15 D. 746, 25 Scot. Jur. 448.

prevented from leading evidence as to copula in the former action, as decree of circumduction passed against him before he had obtained his witnesses.

II. The Instruction with regard to a year and a day contained in Balfour's Instructions to the Commissaries[1] was merely the introduction by Balfour into the Commissary Court of the practice which obtained in his own Court as Official. Subsequent Instructions were also issued which superseded those earlier ones by Balfour.[2] Moreover, it appeared from Hope's Major Practicks that Balfour's Instructions were repealed.[3] This rule, therefore, no longer obtained, and the cases founded upon were wrongly decided.[4]

III. In any view, the decree in the previous action having been obtained by conspiracy and fraud, which were here relevantly averred, and of which proof was offered, the pursuer was entitled to have it opened up.[5]

Argued for the defenders;—

I. (1) The rule of the canon law that sentences against marriage never passed in rem judicatam was based on the fact that the officials who administered the consistorial law had a spiritual jurisdiction, and actually decided more pro salute animæ than to settle litigated points.[6] The canon law was undoubtedly the basis of our consistorial law, but many of its rules were naturally and necessarily discarded when the jurisdiction was transferred from a spiritual to a civil Court, and, among others, this as to the want of finality in decisions, which had arisen solely from the spiritual nature of the jurisdiction. The weight of the authority of the institutional writers was to the effect that the canon law was only incorporated into our law so far as not repugnant to it,[7] and its rules would need to have been expressly adopted before they became binding. The law of England recognised the finality of judgments on questions of status.[8] (2) The terms of the previous summons covered the case of marriage constituted by promise subsequente copula, and that had been made the subject of a special allowance of proof in that action.[9] Moreover, it had been expressly abandoned as a ground of action, as appeared from the interlocutor of the Second Division, and the pursuer must accordingly be held as confessed.

II. The rule of finality after the expiry of a year and day with regard to matrimonial causes was purposely introduced, and a similar policy had been followed in the case of the English Act transferring jurisdiction from the ecclesiastical to the civil Courts in such causes.[10] The object was that in questions of status there should be a definite time when there would

---

[1] Balfour's Practicks, p. 659, arts. 19 and 20, and p. 676.

[2] Stat. 1662, cap. 1; Stat. 1666; A. S. 1553–1790, p. 97; White v. Sibbald, Jan. 28, 1725, M. 7551; Murray v. Edinburgh, July 1, 1697, M. 7549.

[3] Hope's Major Practicks, MS. of 17th century, Adv. Lib. (see Fraser on Parent and Child, 2d edn., List of Authors, p. xxv., note).

[4] Donald v. Thom, May 16, 1823, F. C; Menzies v. Menzies, Nov. 21, 1835, 14 S. 47, 8 Scot. Jur. 24.

[5] Oughton, Ordo Judic. Eccles.-Civ. Brit. et Hibern., tit. 306; Gore v. Stacpoole, Feb. 17, 1813, 1 Dow, 18; Earl of Bandon v. Becher, Aug. 1, 1835, 3 Clark and Finelly, 479; M'Pherson v. Tytler, May 14, 1839, 1 D. 718, 11 Scot. Jur. 435; Forster v. Grigor, Jan. 21, 1871, 9 Macph. 445, 43 Scot. Jur. 214.

[6] Shelford on Mar. and Div. p. 474, note.

[7] Stair, i. 1, 16; Ersk. i. 1, 42.

[8] Smith's Leading Cases (7th ed.), ii. 760, and 803, note, and cases there, et seq.; Meddowcroft v. Huguenin, May 10, 1844, 4 Moore's Privy Council Rep. 386; Perry v. Meddowcroft, Nov. 17, 1846, 10 Beav. 122 and 138; Sopwith v. Sopwith, April 24, 1861, Prob. and Mat. 30 L. J. 131.

[9] Honyman v. Campbell, March 3, 1831, 5 W. and S. 92, Lord Chanc. p. 142; Yelverton v. Longworth, July 28, 1864, 2 Macph., H. of L. 49, Lord Chanc. p. 66.

[10] 20 and 21 Vict. cap. 85, secs. 55-57.

No. 147. June 28, 1876. Lockyer v. Ferryman, &c.

be an end of strife. The rule had been recognised again and again as in existence.[1]

III. The averments of fraud, conspiracy, and subornation here made were far too general and vague. All the facts required to be set forth in such cases.[2]

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—Thirty years ago, that is, in the year 1846, a judgment of absolvitor was pronounced by this Court in an action of declarator of marriage brought at the instance of the present pursuer against the late Miss Janet Sinclair. The alleged marriage was said in the summons to have been constituted by a written contract of marriage, and certain other written documents passing between the parties, by which it was maintained that a marriage had been constituted by declaration de præsenti; and it was also alleged in the summons that this marriage was completed and that the parties thereafter conducted themselves towards each other as husband and wife. In the record in that action the latter statement was expanded into a distinct averment that copula had intervened. But the pursuer made no attempt to prove this assertion, and his counsel at the hearing of the cause formally and deliberately abandoned it.

Since that judgment was pronounced, the defender, Miss Sinclair, herself, and most of the persons concerned in or cognisant of the circumstances, have died. The present pursuer during this long interval has taken no farther step to assert his alleged marital rights; but now that his alleged wife, all her relatives who gave testimony in the former action, and most if not all of the other witnesses, have gone to their graves, he proposes to re-open the whole controversy, and wishes to be allowed to establish all which the judgment of the Court decisively negatived, for the purpose of obtaining right to Miss Sinclair's property against her executors. It is needless to say that the contention is maintained under most unfavourable circumstances, and with all reasonable presumptions against it.

The defenders plead—1st, that the former judgment is res judicata as regards the whole grounds of the present action; 2dly, that the action is wholly excluded by a clause in the instructions applicable to consistorial causes, under which all decrees become final after a year and day from their date; and 3dly, they plead that the allegations of fraud, perjury, and conspiracy are wholly irrelevant.

The pursuer, in reply, maintains that the former decree, being one of absolvitor in a declarator of marriage, did not pass into res judicata, according to the brocard of the canon law that sententia lata contra matrimonium nunquam transit in rem judicatam, and that therefore, even if this action had been brought on the same grounds as those on which the former case proceeded, he is entitled to try the question again. But he farther pleads—1st, that the former judgment was obtained by fraud, perjury, and conspiracy; and 2dly, that the allegation of a marriage constituted by promise subsequente copula was not competently made, and was not embraced in the former action.

These pleas have given rise to an important and interesting discussion, and it is more from regard to the topics discussed in the argument than from any doubt as to the result that I propose to examine them a little in detail.

---

[1] Donald v. Thom, and Menzies v. Menzies, supra, p. 891, note 4; Gardner v. M'Arthur, in note to Donald v. Thom.

[2] Irvine v. Kirkpatrick, August 2, 1850, 7 Bell's App. 186, Lord Brougham, p. 210; Shedden v. Patrick, February, April, and May 1854, 1 Macq. 590, Lord Chancellor (Cranworth), 616.

No. 147.
June 28, 1876.
Lockyer v. Ferryman, &c.

The first question, and one of considerable interest, although, I think, of little difficulty, relates to the plea of res judicata, and its application to matrimonial causes. The rule of the later canon law in regard to res judicata, as contained in the Decretals of Gregory IX., is sufficiently distinct. It will be found in the Decretals, L. ii. tit. 27, chap. 7, and is in substance this, as summarised by Corvinus in his Aphorisms, book iii. tit. 34—"Sententia recte lata, post decem dies, si ab ea non fuerit appellatum transit in rem judicatam." That is the general rule. Then comes the exception—"In rem judicatam non transit sententia quæ impugnari potest; ut est ea quæ contra matrimonium, aut pro matrimonio, in gradu prohibito contracto, lata."

In the more expanded exposition of Sanchez, the distinction between the sententia contra matrimonium and the sententia pro matrimonio is not so sharply drawn; but it comes out quite distinctly in section 14 of Disputatio 100, book 7. The ratio is simply this, and it is mainly applicable to suits for the annulling of a subsisting marriage, in which a sentence pro matrimonio passes into res judicata by the tacit consent of both parties, who may lawfully remain together if there be no annulling impediment, and that consent may be inferred from the absence of an appeal. But a sentence contra matrimonium, either annulling the marriage or separating the parties, never passes into res judicata, because if the marriage is lawful, it is sinful for the spouses to live separate. His words are—"Quia sententia illa transiens in rem judicatam foveret peccatum, separando veros conjuges, vel uniendo qui tales esse nequeunt."—L. vii. t. 100, sec. 1. It is on this ground alone, viz. the duty of the Church to provide against the possible sin of separating husband and wife, that this exception in favour of sentences contra matrimonium from the general law of res judicata is decided in the Decretals and defended by the commentators.

Before considering the grounds on which it has been contended that a law such as this should be enforced in this Court in regard to a purely civil process, I may remark, that if we had occupied the place of the Superior Spiritual Courts of which Sanchez writes, I do not think the pursuer would fare in the present action much better than under our ordinary rules. For, assuming it to be true, which may be doubted, that the former decree was a sentence contra matrimonium in the sense of the Decretals, and that therefore it did not pass into res judicata, it by no means follows, and there is no authority to that effect in the canon law, that the pursuer, as a matter of right, would have been entitled to have his case tried again. The very reverse is quite clearly indicated in the very passage in the Decretals to which I have referred. The power of the Superior Spiritual Court to permit or direct rehearing of the case was entirely discretionary, and was more of the nature of a dispensing power than an ordinary exercise of jurisdiction, as very clearly appears from the instances given in the Decretals on which this plea is founded. And so the appropriate proceeding under it was not by raising a new action in the same tribunal, but by a querela or complaint to the Superior Spiritual Court. As to this, Sanchez says, "In the second place, understand that although the sentence does not wholly pass in rem judicatam, it does pass to this effect, that he who wishes to impugn it shall not be heard to do so indiscriminately, but must allege some probable cause of injustice, which the Judge may be led to believe jure ultimo, so that the contending parties may not be heard indefinitely."

Now, what have we here? In the first place, one of the alleged spouses is dead, and thus no sin can possibly arise from the former decree subsisting. I suspect

No. 147. June 28, 1876. Lockyer v. Ferryman, &c.

this of itself would have been conclusive, for we learn from Sanchez, sec. 12, that where the suit is with third parties, and not between the spouses, the exception does not apply. But, secondly, the pursuer has delayed to impugn the decree until all the witnesses are dead, and that by itself would be quite sufficient against the exercise of any such discretionary power, unless the pursuer can allege, which I shall consider afterwards, that he could not have brought his action sooner. But on the face of this record the pursuer is so far from shewing why the decree should be opened up, that he has shewn the best possible reason for refusing to disturb it. He has delayed his challenge until, by his own admission, the case cannot be fairly tried. If, therefore, he were to be judged by the canon law, it would rather appear that he must fail. But, putting this apart, I am quite clear that the rule in question forms no part of our law. It is not said ever to have been acted on in any single case, not even in the Bishop's Courts, during the very questionable period in which, after the Reformation, the consistorial law was administered by them. We are asked to sanction that which in every view is an entire novelty. I need not detain the Court by going into the exhausted controversy of the authority of the pontifical law in Scotland. I had thought it had been well settled, 1st, that it never was adopted in its integrity, even in Catholic times; 2dly, that since the Reformation, while our consistorial law has been necessarily built on the broad lines of the canon law, we have adopted its principles and maxims only as we adopted those of the civil law—we have done so in so far as these appeared to be just and equitable, and consonant to the general spirit of our jurisprudence, and no farther; and 3dly, that matrimonial suits are purely civil causes, and are entertained in this Court as a purely civil tribunal, having no right and no duty to administer any spiritual jurisdiction whatever, and whatever may have been the practice of the Episcopal Courts, during those troubled years after the Reformation in which Episcopacy was established in Scotland, since the Revolution there has been no such thing as a spiritual sentence pronounced by the civil Court, nor is any cause cognisable by us on spiritual grounds. Instead, therefore, of following the argument for the pursuer into the obsolete records of the old Commissary Court I prefer to rely on the safer authority of Stair and Erskine as to the effect to be given to the pontifical law. Stair says—"And there is reason for the abrogation of the canon law at the establishing of the Protestant religion, because in the Popish Church it was held as an authoritative law; but since it is only esteemed a law as to those cases that were acted by it when it was in vigour, and in the rest only as our customs assume some particulars thereof, according to the weight of the matter." And so Erskine, speaking of the canon law, says—"It is compounded, on the one hand, of beautiful principles of equity, chiefly borrowed from the Roman law, and, on the other, of a collection of absurd canons and rescripts, extolling Church authority above all secular powers." I am not at all moved by the dicta ascribed to Lord Stowell and Lord Eldon in the cases of Dalrymple and M'Adam. They are true in the general sense in which alone they were delivered, that our marriage law and that of England rested on the general principles of the canon law, excepting so far as altered. It was, beyond doubt, not only a system of rules for Churchmen, pro salute animæ, but a great, and in its better days a wise, and in some respects a salutary, code of civil and social jurisprudence. But it must not be forgotten, that while the original principles of the canon law applicable to marriage exhibit a large and philosophical spirit, there is no part of the whole system of the canon law, as it ultimately prevailed, so suggestive of social tyranny, or so much opposed to human freedom and happiness, as that by which the marriage law came to be encrusted. The whole doctrine of the impediments to marriage, which comprised a long catalogue, embracing many matters besides the prohibited degrees, and some of the most arbitrary and frivolous description, and the corresponding doctrine of the power of dispensation, of themselves would have been perfectly sufficient to insure its rejection in this country; and the very brocard with which we are dealing, the result and object of which was to keep in the hands of the ecclesiastical authority for an indefinite time the honour and happiness of many families, is simply one of the worst of those weeds which grew up so luxuriantly round the pontifical fabric.

Without trespassing on the historical ground, my opinion on this plea of res judicata is, that as this is a purely civil action, and as the Court is a purely civil Court, it must be regulated by the general principles applicable to our civil jurisprudence, and cannot be affected by the manner in which any spiritual Court decided or dealt with spiritual causes on spiritual grounds.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the judgment in the former case stands in the way of the consideration of the present by the exception rei judicatæ. I am farther of opinion that the decree in the former action is applicable to the whole ground embraced in the present. It was contended on the part of the pursuer that his former action did not embrace the ground of a marriage constituted by promise subsequente copula. If it had not embraced it, it would not have been surprising, seeing that such a ground of declarator on the part of the man is, if competent, to say the least of it, very unusual. But I have no doubt whatever that the summons quite sufficiently embraced, and indeed necessarily embraced, the ground in question, so far as it was competent. He alleged, indeed, in the former summons, sponsalia de præsenti; but that necessarily includes a promise de futuro also; and then he alleges that the marriage was completed, and that the parties conducted themselves to each other as husband and wife. Had the pleadings rested there, they would have been sufficient; but in the condescendence the allegation is specifically made. It was the subject of a special allowance of proof, obtained on the part of the pursuer without objection on the part of the defender, and therefore I have no doubt that this ground was sufficiently pleaded, and was negatived by a final and effectual judgment. I may observe that the same objection was taken and disregarded in the well-known case of Honyman v. Campbell, 5 Wilson and Shaw, 123. Lord Justice-Clerk Boyle says in that case—"The objection taken is of this nature, that in the summons, while the pursuer concludes for decree of declarator of marriage, she confines herself to one particular species of marriage, viz. a marriage said to have taken place in 1813 by declaration de præsenti between the parties as husband and wife, and that that is the only ground in the summons on which she lays her case. But, my Lords, after attending as closely as I can, and being free to admit that, according to the rules of strict procedure which we now observe in this Court, I was at first sight struck with the importance of the objection, yet, upon consideration of the whole of that summons and the objections taken to it, I am of opinion that they are not good." The Lord Chancellor deals in a similar way with the objection taken to the summons, and says (p. 142)—"In this case the whole matter is brought in, and all the ways in which a party may be married are set forth, without very distinctly specifying in which of those several ways it is; but reliance is mainly placed on the latter part of the summons. Still, within the four corners of the summons I find enough to let in evidence of the kind of marriage now relied on." And the case was decided on this ground.

No. 147. June 28, 1876. Lockyer v. Ferryman, &c.

But even if I had been of a different opinion, I should have been prepared to hold that the course which the pursuer has followed on this matter is one which cannot be permitted to succeed. The pursuer in the former case deliberately raised and deliberately abandoned this ground of action as a substantive fact. We learn this from the opinions of the Judges, who expressed themselves very strongly on this subject. I apprehend that by thus abandoning this allegation, the pursuer admitted its falsehood, or at least barred himself from again asserting its truth. He would not have been permitted to have raised this question on appeal to the House of Lords in the former case, not because the judgment was final, but because the pursuer was confessed on this specific allegation. Now, what is proposed here? The pursuer made a grievous imputation on the character of Miss Sinclair—an imputation which, if false, was base in the extreme. The lady denied the charge, and defied her antagonist to the trial of it. After taking a judgment allowing him to prove it, he made no attempt to support it by evidence, but deliberately abandoned it in Court, and during the five-and-twenty years which elapsed before the lady's death he never reasserted it. Now he proposes to blast her memory when she is in her grave. It is sufficiently doubtful whether such an action is competent at all after the death of one of the parties; but I am quite clear that in this case the pursuer is conclusively barred from maintaining it.

On this preliminary plea, therefore, I am very clearly of opinion that the former judgment is res judicata, being a judgment in an action between the same parties, relative to the same subject-matter, and brought on the same grounds. But I have still to consider the allegations of fraud, conspiracy, and perjury by which the former decree is said to have been obtained.

I entertain no doubt that an allegation relevantly made, that a decree was obtained by the successful party having induced or bribed the witnesses to depone falsely, is, like any other fraud, sufficient to rescind or subvert a decree so obtained. If a man obtains a decree by bribing the Judge, or by personating the creditor in a debt, the judgment so obtained must yield to a proof of the facts. This is not controverted for the first time. In the first volume of Sir George Mackenzie's works, page 42, there is a pleading by that accomplished lawyer in the case of Milton v. Milton, which raised the question in what case a sentence may be reduced by a reprobator of the depositions of the witnesses whereupon the sentence was founded. In this pleading he deals with the whole question of how far an allegation of conspiracy and perjury is relevant, and refutes with great detail all the suggestions which were urged from the bar in this case. He quotes a passage from the Pandects, book 42, title 1, and law 33, De re Judicata, which is precisely in point:—"Hadrianus aditus per libellum a Julio Tarentino et indicante eo falsis testimoniis, conspiratione adversariorum, testibus pecunia corruptis, religionem judicis circumventam esse, in integrum causam restituendam; in hæc verba rescripsit, 'Exemplum libelli dati mihi a Julio Tarentino mitti tibi jussi; tu, si tibi probaverit, conspiratione adversariorum, et testibus pecunia corruptis, oppressum se, et rem severe vindica; et si quæ a judice, tam malo exemplo circumscripto judicata sunt, in integrum restitue.'"

The authorities dwelt upon from the law of England as to collusion seem to have no application to this matter. The question which arose in these cases was not what effect the ecclesiastical Court would give to its own sentences, or on what grounds they would set them aside, but what effect another Court, which could neither pronounce them nor set them aside, ought to give to them. It would rather seem on principle that the sentence, while it stood, should receive effect. But in these cases, when the sentence appeared to have passed by collusion, the difficulty was avoided by holding it not to be a sentence at all. But whatever the logic of these cases, this is a totally different matter. I entertain no doubt that a Court which has the power of pronouncing or reducing its own sentences is entitled to set aside any decree which is relevantly challenged, on the ground that the party has obtained it by the procuring of false testimony; and there is abundant authority to that effect.

No. 147.

June 28, 1876.
Lockyer v. Ferryman, &c.

A qualification, however, must be observed here. If the ground of challenge, or the assignment of perjury, be merely the repetition in another form of the contention or plea which was proponed and repelled in the former suit, or the assertion of facts which were within the knowlege of the party at the time the decree was pronounced, this can form no ground for impugning the decree. It is so laid down by Voet, in words which are clear and precise. He says—"Quod si sententia ex falsis instrumentis aut testimoniis aliisque documentis lata sit, rescindi potest, ubi falsitas probata fuerit, quæ lite pendente neque adversario neque judici innotuerat, sic ut religio judicis per hujusmodi falsitatem circumventa fuerit; petita ad id per modum querelæ vel accusationis (non per actionem ordinariam) restitutione in integrum, ut sententia, per restitutionem enervata, perdat deinceps omnem rei judicatæ auctoritatem, ac causa ex integro examinatur, perinde ac si judicatum non esset."

Voet rightly restricts this remedy to grounds of which neither the party nor Judge were aware, and he goes on to say that it will not be sufficient to entitle the party to this remedy to allege that he has since found documents which will enable him better to prove his case. Now, applying this rule to the allegations in the present summons (which the pursuer proposed to amend), I find nothing whatever stated which amounts to a relevant allegation of fraud. The truth or falsehood of the statements of the witnesses was the question which was tried in the former case, so was their honesty or credibility, and the alleged falsehood must have been quite well known to the pursuer at the time. To say now that they swore falsely is to say no more than he said then. To say that the lady and the witnesses knew these statements to be false is merely to repeat what the pursuer says that he knew, and what he maintained before. Nor is any new aspect given to the allegation by saying that Miss Sinclair and her aunt and her sister acted in concert in giving and promoting this evidence. The pursuer knew that they acted in concert, and probably had they been alive they would have avowed that they did so. It would have been a totally different matter had the alleged false testimony related to something not within the pursuer's knowledge at the time, and in regard to which he could point to specific sources of information by which the truth was at last revealed to him. But no such allegation is to be found from beginning to end of this record. He says he has been informed of this conspiracy since Miss Sinclair's death. But he was bound to have said when, and how, and by whom he was so informed. He says that one of the witnesses had repeatedly said that he was bribed; but he nowhere makes the specific allegation that the witness was bribed, neither does he say, what was essential, how and from whom he had this information.

Divested, therefore, of its generalities, I find nothing in this assignment of conspiracy and perjury but that which was perfectly well known before, namely, that these witnesses gave evidence which the pursuer says they knew not to be true, and that they all acted in concert in doing so. As to their knowledge of their evidence not being true, it is certain that the pursuer knew as much about that when the evidence was given as he does now.

No. 147. June 28, 1876. Lockyer v. Ferryman, &c.

One advantage, no doubt, the pursuer would have in a re-trial of the case: The evidence he impugns could not be repeated; nor could the parties assailed defend themselves. But this is hardly an advantage to which the pursuer is entitled.

It only remains that I should say one word on the plea which the Lord Ordinary has sustained, founded on the instructions given to the commissioners at different periods during the existence of that Court, and the cases of Donald v. Thom, and of Menzies, which were referred to. I have the greatest respect for the Judges who decided the case of Donald v. Thom and the subsequent case of Menzies, but I am not satisfied that these instructions have the effect attributed to them. The instructions relate not to matrimonial causes only, but to questions as to teinds, as to testaments, and a variety of other important branches of jurisdiction. We are asked to say that no judgment pronounced by this Court in any such causes can become final until a year and day has elapsed. Whatever may have been the operation of these instructions in the old Court of the Commissaries I am inclined to think that they do not apply to judgments of this Court, and I am not aware of a single example in which any such application of them has been made. But it is quite unnecessary to decide that matter. With this exception, I am for adhering to the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

Lord Neaves.—I concur in the judgment which your Lordship proposes to pronounce, and generally on the same grounds.

This case would be one of great importance to the public, as well as to the parties, if it were one of difficulty; but it appears to me to be attended with no difficulty. To my mind it is too clear to leave any room for doubt or hesitation. There are so many grounds for throwing out this action that one does not know which to put in the van.

The argument has raised several questions as to the law of Scotland itself, and as to the influence or effect of the canon law upon our own law.

There can be no doubt that the canon law had considerable authority in all the Christian countries which came under the jurisdiction of the Latin Church. At the same time I think, with deference, that there is some exaggeration in the judgments of Lord Stowell and Lord Eldon, where they trace some of the principles of our law directly to the canon law. I cannot say that I think that the principle of de præsenti consent constituting marriage can be said to come from any source other than the law of nature and the elements of the Roman law. The canon law did not call it into existence; it belonged to the category of contract, and was dictated by the necessities of humanity and social life; and so arose directly from the law of nature embodied in the common law.

After the Reformation the authority of the canon law in this country was greatly weakened. When we threw off the spiritual authority of the Popes we naturally also threw off their judicial authority, and so when we got rid of the Popes we got rid of their canons to a great extent. We began to administer consistorial law in civil Courts, and when the causes were in civil Courts they fell naturally under the rules of civil procedure, and among others, as I think, under the rule of res judicata,—the House of Lords then coming in place of the Pope as regards review. Any portion of the canon law which we adopted or preserved at the Reformation was only secundum bonum et æquum, and we are not likely to have adopted a rule by which a case such as this could be tried over and over again after the lapse of any intervals of time—long or short. Were it so such a case might be tried annually, to the infinite distress of the party so oppressed.

The next point is—supposing there can be res judicata in matrimonial causes—does the rule apply here? If we look at the former action we find it was a declarator of marriage, just as this is. The record in the former action is framed on the same grounds as that we are now dealing with. There is an alleged contract of marriage, and copula is stated to have followed on it. Of these statements proof was allowed to the pursuer. That proof was taken, but it contained no proof of the copula averred, and that part of the case was expressly given up by the pursuer in the presence of the Court. But now the pursuer says here, I ought not to have been allowed to add the statement of copula to my original summons, and the Court who allowed me to do so was wrong, and I am now entitled to get rid of the statement, and all that followed on it. Your Lordship has pointed out that there are in the original summons itself sufficient allegations that, after the execution of the contract of marriage, the parties conducted themselves as married persons. That, it is true, is set forth very generally in the summons, but then it was stated specially, and with particularity, in the condescendence, without objection being taken by any one. The summons, without that statement, would not have been relevant, for it is as fixed a rule as can be, that a mere marriage-contract, as we frame it, is not a present consent but one de futuro. Mr Erskine has stated that very clearly in his Institutes, book 1, tit. iv., sec. 3,—"The written antenuptial contracts, therefore, in use with us, do not constitute marriage; for though their style seems to import a consent de præsenti in the following words, 'We take one another for our lawful spouses,' yet the obligation, which is immediately subjoined, to solemnise the marriage in the face of the Church, shews that the parties do not hold thecontract for perfected till that ceremony be performed. Hence instances have occurred of persons being charged upon letters of horning to solemnise the marriage in the terms of that written obligation; whereas, if the marriage had been perfected by subscribing the contract, the proper action would have been a declarator of it before the Commissaries." That statement by Erskine is not mere conjecture, but it is the law of the document, and a law which ought not to be altered or called in question. The summons, therefore, in the previous case, would not have been relevant without something importing cohabitation. The action was thus one truly laid on promise subsequente copula, as more fully developed in the condescendence, and could not else have been relevant.

A man cannot take away the effect of res judicata by merely abandoning one of his grounds of action. Res judicata is not to be got rid of by mere variations in the circumstances. Any additional fact belonging to the same general category will not serve to avoid the plea. On these grounds I have no doubt that there is res judicata here.

I know of no example in which an action for the constitution of marriage subsequente copula was brought after the death of one of the parties, and it looks as if it were not a proper proceeding; because such summonses, according to our styles, usually contain a conclusion for a decerniture upon the defender to solemnise the marriage. And, as Mr Walter Ross, in the preface to his Lectures (p. 13), says,—"Styles, as the unerring records of our jurisprudence, were of the greatest authority with our forefathers. 'Arguments brought from style (says

No. 147. June 28, 1876. Lockyer v. Ferryman, &c.

Sir George Mackenzie) are a great part of our fundamental law—they, to lawyers, are what the chart is to geographers, or the compass to seamen.'"

Besides, after the death of one of the parties, it is impossible to get at the true state of matters. The very connection between the promise and the copula is of the utmost importance, and often gives rise to very delicate considerations. It does not follow that marriage is the result of every copula following after a promise. The promise and the copula may bear no relation to each other at all. The special circumstances are of vital importance in such cases. If, on the whole matter, there has been no verus consensus, then there can be no marriage. A promise in itself is no verus consensus, and if it is not clear that the intercourse following amounted to a consent to marry there is no marriage. Then, is it possible in this case to overlook the mora? Thirty years have passed since the case was tried, and the woman is in her grave with all her immediate kin. Then comes this pursuer with his old summons, and wishes to re-try the case, when she is dead, in order to gain a large pecuniary advantage. The effect of this mora is matter of the highest importance.

As to collusion, there was no collusion between the pursuer and defender of the nature stated in the cases cited to us; there is no ground for alleging that they entered into any collusive agreement to deceive the Judge, and all the allegations tending otherwise to impeach the proof are irrelevant and inadmissible, particularly when reference is made to the pursuer's own course of action in the former case.

I concur with your Lordship that it is not necessary to decide the question as to finality after a year and day. The other circumstances are amply sufficient.

Lord Ormidale.—Although this case raises some questions of importance and interest I cannot say that I think it is attended with difficulty.

The present is a second action at the instance of the pursuer, having for its object to establish that a marriage had been entered into between him and the late Miss Janet Sinclair. His first action was directed against Miss Sinclair herself, and was instituted in this Court in 1839. It was defended by Miss Sinclair, who denied that there had been any marriage between her and the pursuer. A litigation ensued, in the course of which the parties joined issue on the question whether there had been a marriage or not; and the litigation did not terminate until 1846, when a judgment of the Lord Ordinary assoilzieing Miss Sinclair from the pursuer's action was unanimously adhered to in the Inner-House. And it was only in August last (1875) that the present action was brought by the pursuer, directed against Miss Sinclair's testamentary trustees, the leading conclusion of which is, like that in the former action, a declarator of his marriage with Miss Sinclair. Not only has the present action been brought after such a lapse of time, but also about six years after the death of Miss Sinclair herself, and after the death of her sister, her aunt, and her uncle Sir John Sinclair of Barrock, as well as others, being all the parties who, on the pursuer's own shewing, could be expected to throw any material light upon the disputed question.

It is in these circumstances, generally stated, that the Lord Ordinary has pronounced the interlocutor reclaimed against, assoilzieing the defenders from this second action of the pursuer, on the ground that the judgment in the former action is conclusive against him on the principle of res judicata, and for the other reasons stated in his interlocutor and relative note.

It was contended on the part of the pursuer, in support of his reclaiming note—1st, that according to the canon law, which he represented as being also the law of Scotland, there is no prescription or finality of a judgment pronounced adversely to the marriage status; or, in other words, that the pursuer neither was nor could be precluded, on the principle of res judicata, or on any other ground of finality, from insisting in the present or in as many more actions as he might choose to bring, that he was married to the late Miss Sinclair; 2d, that his present action is not exposed to the defence given effect to by the Lord Ordinary, founded either upon the finality of judgments in consistorial cases referred to in the Instructions to Commissaries, of 1653, or upon the plea of res judicata, or upon any other ground; and 3d, that whatever effect the plea of res judicata might, in other circumstances, be entitled to, none can be given to it in the present case, where the judgment in the former action was, as he maintained, obtained through conspiracy and fraud.

(1) In regard to the pursuer's contention, founded on the canon law, I have no hesitation whatever in rejecting it. The canon law may, no doubt, be said, fairly enough, to be the basis of the consistorial law of Scotland, but that all its rules and principles are to be held as imported into, and to form part of, the consistorial law of Scotland, I entirely dispute. No authority, no decided case, not even the dictum of any of the institutional writers, was referred to by the pursuer in support of his contention. On the contrary, all the authorities, at least all of them entitled to any weight or consideration at the present day, appear to me to be very clearly and unmistakeably opposed to the pursuer. Thus, Lord Stair, in the passage of his great work (b. i., t. 1, sec. 16), commented on in the argument, says that none of the rules in the civil, canon, or feudal laws "have with us the authority of law, and are therefore only received according to their equity and expediency, secundum bonum et æquum;" and Mr Erskine again, who followed Lord Stair at a later period, says (b. i., t. 1, sec. 42), in reference to the canon law,—"That since the Reformation it has declined fast in its authority, so that it is now little respected except in questions of tithes, patronages, and a few articles more of ecclesiastical right, where the canons are consistent with the Protestant principle." And although I am not aware of any judicial decision or other express authority refusing to give effect to the rule of the canon law, that there is no finality of a judgment adverse to the marriage status—if there be such a rule, of which I am not satisfied, at least in the absolute and unqualified sense in which it was urged for the pursuer—I can entertain no doubt that this arises from the circumstance that so startling and unjust a rule—one so entirely opposed to what in modern times must be held to be, in the words of Lord Stair, secundum bonum et æquum—has not been attempted to be founded on or enforced. The present action, indeed, suggests very forcibly the inexpediency of adopting the rule of the canon law referred to, if there be such a rule, for supposing that Miss Sinclair had married another person by whom she had children during the thirty years which intervened betwixt the termination of the pursuer's former suit and the commencement of his present action, what complicated relations and interests might have arisen—relations and interests which, supposing the pursuer were right in his contention, would probably, if not inevitably, have led to results of the most painful and distressing description.

But although, for the reasons which have been now alluded to, there may be no express or direct decision on the point, nothing, I think, can be more conclusive on the subject than the case of Shedden v. Patrick, in which both this Court and the House of Lords proceeded on the assumption that such a rule formed no part of the law of Scotland. And in the later case of Longworth v. Yelverton (March 10, 1865, 3 Macph. 648), the Lord President observed in reference to an argument such as that maintained by the pursuer in the present case,—"I think Mr Smith" (the pursuer's counsel) "carried it a little further, and seemed to suggest that in consistorial suits of this kind there was very little element of res judicata at all, and that the judgment might be opened up at any time. I do not think that that is a sound position according to our law, and I do not see any good reason why, in consistorial questions of this kind in regard to status, there ought to be less conclusiveness or res judicata than in other cases." The case of Norris v. Gilchrist, cited by the pursuer, is also, I think, when fairly considered, an authority against rather than favourable to him; for, as I read the report of that case, the validity of the plea of res judicata, where the circumstances admitted of its application, as in the present case, was distinctly recognised by all the learned Judges, although in that case it was, quite consistently, held that failure in a service could not found a defence of res judicata to an action of declarator of legitimacy—the object of the two proceedings being essentially different; the one being a step of procedure merely towards the vindication of patrimonial rights and interests, and the other having for its direct and sole object the establishment of personal status. I cannot say, therefore, that I have been the least moved in the present case by that of Norris v. Gilchrist, the decision in which I must regard as inapplicable.

No. 147. June 28, 1876. Lockyer v. Ferryman, &c.

(2) I have been unable, however, to satisfy myself that the defence of finality given effect to by the Lord Ordinary, founded upon the Instructions of 1563 to Commissaries, can be safely relied upon; and, fortunately for the defenders, it is not necessary for their defence that it should be. I doubt very much whether the Instructions referred to were intended to do more than regulate the mode and extent of review of the judgments of Commissaries in the processes themselves in which these judgments were pronounced. And in this view of the case of Donald v. Thom, cited at the debate, and Menzies v. Menzies, referred to in the Lord Ordinary's note, in both of which a review in this Court by way of reduction of the judgments of inferior Commissaries was sought, cannot be available as precedents in the present case, where a reduction is sought of a former judgment—not of any inferior Court or Commissary but of a judgment of this Court, and on grounds different, as the pursuer represents it, from the grounds on which the Court proceeded in pronouncing the former judgment. Besides, since the date of the two commissary judgments sought to be reduced in Donald v. Thom, and Menzies v. Menzies, all actions of declarator of marriage, as well as some other consistorial actions, have been made competent to the supreme Court alone by the statutes 4 Geo. IV. cap. 97, and 1 Will. IV. cap. 69. Accordingly, the judgment now sought to be reduced was pronounced, not by the Commissaries to whom the Instructions in question were addressed, but by the Lords of Council and Session. Having regard, then, to the enactments of the statutes just referred to, and in particular to section 9 of the former and section 33 of the latter, I am disposed to think that since the passing of these Acts, if not before, the finality referred to in the Instructions to Commissaries, on which the Lord Ordinary founds, is no longer applicable.

(3) But if that be so, the defence of res judicata, also sustained by the Lord Ordinary, becomes all the more important. In regard to this defence (which I cannot doubt is equally available in such a case as the present as in any other) the only answer made to it by the pursuer, as I understood his argument, was, that although the object of his present action is in its leading conclusion the same as that of his former one, they are laid upon different grounds—that is to say, that while the former action was libelled exclusively upon the alleged marriage having been completed by the interchange of matrimonial consent de præsenti, the present action, in addition to that ground, is also laid upon the separate ground of the marriage having been constituted by promise subsequente copula.

Now, whether, in the very peculiar circumstances in which the present action has been brought, and especially keeping in view the lapse of time which occurred between the termination of the former suit, the death of Miss Sinclair and other parties during that time, and consequent loss of evidence and change of circumstances, there might not have been a good and sufficient defence to the present action, even although laid, as averred by the pursuer, upon grounds different from that libelled on in the former, I think it unnecessary to consider, because I am quite clear that the pursuer is not in a position to maintain that his present is laid upon any grounds different from those of his former action. The way in which the pursuer endeavours to maintain the contrary is not a little singular, for while he admits that in the record, as ultimately made up and closed in the former action, and on which the parties joined issue and went to proof, both grounds of action—promise with copula as well as interchange of consent de præsenti—were expressly and unequivocally founded on by him—he says he committed an irregularity in doing so, in respect that the latter ground of action was alone in the summons. This is the very singular way in which the pursuer endeavours to avoid the plea of res judicata. But I am very clear, in the first place, that there is no room for the distinction on which he founds between his summons and record in the former suit; and, in the second place, that even if there were, he is barred from now availing himself of it.

I have examined the summons and record in the former suit, and I am quite satisfied that promise cum copula as a ground of action was not only condescended on in the record, but also libelled on in the summons. The written contract of marriage was expressly libelled on, and particularly that part of it whereby the parties agreed to marry, and "promised to solemnise the bond of marriage with all convenient speed." And then, after setting out the interchange of lines to the effect that the parties held themselves as married, the pursuer goes on to libel that "they afterwards considered themselves as married, and conducted themselves towards each other as husband and wife." I think there was here a sufficient libelling of marriage on both the grounds referred to; and at any rate, that any room for doubt on the subject must be held to be cleared up and removed by the statements and pleas in the record as subsequently made up and closed. And that it was so understood by both parties in the former suit is beyond all question, for not only did the pursuer obtain an order or allowance to prove all his averments in his closed record, but he did so without objection on the part of the defender. Nor do I think it of any consequence that the pursuer did not lead any parole evidence, but contented himself with what he had in writing, and obtained in the cross-examination of the defender's witnesses. That the Lord Ordinary in the cause held that the pursuer had libelled as one of his grounds of action promise subsequente copula is clear from the terms of his judgment on considering the proof and whole cause; for it appears from the report of the case (8 D. 589) that he expressly found "that the pursuer has totally failed to prove that any consummation of the said intended marriage ever took place, as alleged in the libel and record." And the interlocutor containing this finding (p. 627 of report) was adhered to by the Court. But the matter does not rest there; for I find from the same report (p. 508) that the Lord Justice-Clerk, in giving judgment in the Inner-House on the pursuer's reclaiming note against the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, stated that he had abandoned his allegation of consummation, and that "the case was most distinctly stated to us as one in which it was not possible, or intended, to allege that any conjugal intercourse had followed on the declarations which are said to constitute, and to have been granted for the purpse of constituting, actual marriage, as of the date, between the parties." Lord Cockburn also (642) refers to this abandonment by the pursuer. Accordingly, the formal judgment of the Court contains an express finding to the effect that "the pursuer by his counsel at the bar expressly admitted that he did not now insist, as any part of the case, in the averment that consummation of the alleged marriage between him and the defender by conjugal intercourse had ever taken place, and that he did not mean to represent any part of the proof as intended to prove the same, even indirectly." And it was further expressly found "that the pursuer by his counsel at the bar stated that he did not insist as any part of his case in the averment that the alleged marriage had been made known to any of the relations or domestics of the defender; and therefore refuse the reclaiming note, and adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary reclaimed against; and of new assoilzie the defender from the whole conclusions of the libel, and decern."

No. 147. June 28, 1876. Lockyer v. Ferryman, &c.

In this state of the matter it is impossible, I think, for the Court now, on any statements which are made in the present record, to hold that the judgment in the former suit is not res judicata against him, or that he is not barred and precluded from insisting in the present action.

(4) But the pursuer argued that the plea of res judicata stated against the present action is untenable, because the judgment in the former suit was obtained by fraud, conspiracy, and subornation of perjury; and I do not say, having regard to the opinions of the learned Judges in this Court, and of the noble and learned Lords in the Court of last resort, in Shedden v. Patrick, that a case might not be laid upon fraud and conspiracy and subornation of perjury so as to require investigation; but I am very clearly of opinion that the present is not a case of that description. In order to demonstrate this, I consider it unnecessary to go over the pursuer's averments in any detail, especially after the observations which have been already made on the subject by both your Lordships who have preceded me in delivering your opinions. I may observe, however, that he nowhere avers that there was conspiracy or collusion of any kind between him and the defender, Miss Sinclair, in the former action, having for its object to impose on the Court, and to obtain a judgment as in a fictitious or mock suit. That is not the nature of his case at all. At the very most his averments amount merely to some very vague statements and general charges of conspiracy and collusion between the defender, her sister, and her aunt, all of whom are now dead. And these statements or charges are manifestly so vague and wanting in precision as to be clearly untenable and unavailing in any view that can be taken of them. On this point it is sufficient to refer to the opinions delivered in the House of Lords in the case of Shedden v. Patrick, and also in the case of Irvine or Douglas v. Kilpatrick (7 Bell's Appeals, p. 186). These opinions are, I think, conclusive to the effect that the pursuer's averments, as well in the record as closed as in his proposed amendments, are quite insufficient, as not shewing with the requisite relevancy and precision of what the alleged fraudulent conspiracy consists—how, when, and where it was entered into or carried out, if it ever existed, which I see no reason for believing it did.

In the circumstances, and for the reasons now stated, I am of opinion that the pursuer's reclaiming note ought to be refused, and the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor adhered to, except as regards its second finding, which I think should be recalled as unnecessary.

LORD GIFFORD.—On 5th April 1842, being now upwards of thirty-four years ago, the present pursuer, Mr Edmund Beatty Lockyer, raised an action of declarator of marriage against Miss Janet S. T. Sinclair, of Freswick, in Caithness. The summons concluded to have it found and declared that the pursuer and Miss Janet Sinclair were lawfully married persons—husband and wife of each other—and there were the usual ancillary conclusions for adherence, and otherwise.

The action was defended by Miss Sinclair, who denied that any marriage had ever taken place, or that anything had ever followed on the antenuptial marriage-contract which had been executed by the parties, or on certain writings which had thereafter passed between them. In the summons the pursuer had not averred specifically that the alleged marriage was ever consummated, or that any sexual intercourse had ever taken place. He contented himself with averring generally in the summons that the parties, after de præsenti consent to marry had taken place, "considered themselves as married, and conducted themselves towards each other as husband and wife."

In the revised condescendence, however, the pursuer made this general statement specific, and averred a number of times and places when and at which connection was said to have taken place. These averments Miss Sinclair denied, as the record bears, "in the most solemn and positive manner," and the record was then closed between the parties; the pursuer founding his case that marriage had taken place (1) On the averment that solemn and serious de præsenti consent had been interchanged between him and Miss Sinclair, and (2) That even if this were not so, actual marriage was completed by written promise to marry subsequente copula.

A very long and very keenly contested litigation followed, and continued for four years. The whole of the pursuer's averments in his revised condescendence were remitted to proof. A very long proof was led, consisting not only of documents and correspondence passing between the parties, but also of parole testimony, and although the number of witnesses was not great, consisting (including the pursuer's conjunct proof) of only five witnesses in all, yet the examination of these witnesses was very minute and protracted, extending to upwards of 300 pages of print.

After a long struggle in the proof, in the course of which numerous questions as to competency were raised, and after very full argument, the case was decided against the pursuer—first by the Lord Ordinary, and afterwards by the unanimous judgment of the four Judges of the Second Division. The whole Judges were of opinion that no marriage had taken place between the pursuer and Miss Sinclair, and it is important to note, in reference to the contention now maintained by the pursuer, that the judgment of the Second Division contains the following very express and specific finding:—"Find that in stating his case on the merits of the declarator, the pursuer by his counsel at the bar expressly admitted that he did not now insist as any part of his case in the averment that consummation of the alleged marriage between him and the defender by conjugal intercourse had ever taken place, and that he did not mean to represent any part of the proof as intended to prove the same even indirectly; and further find that the pursuer by his counsel at the bar stated that he did not insist as any part of his case in the averment that the alleged marriage had been made known to any of the relations or domestics of the defender." It was besides perfectly clear upon the proof which had been led in the case (and this is noticed by all the Judges) that the pursuer had utterly and absolutely failed to prove any of his averments regarding the consummation of the alleged marriage, and had even failed to raise the slightest suspicion that any connection had or might have taken place. On this point, and as an example, I may notice what was said by Lord Justice-Clerk Hope. Speaking of the pursuer's averments of consummation, his Lordship says—"It is right to add (but I beg to state that I only do so lest any inference should be drawn from the omission to make the statement, not in the least degree because I think it in any respect necessary for the vindication of this lady from any imputation, or because I think she can suffer from anything this pursuer has said) that, looking to the whole proof, I not only utterly disbelieve the statements on this point which the pursuer chose to place on the records of the Court—I disbelieve them not merely as a Judge examining evidence, but as a man scrutinising narrowly the conduct of a female—I not only disbelieve them, but I am satisfied that they were truly placed by the pursuer on record for the purpose, by intimidation, of driving the defender into marriage, or of attempting to dishonour the lady by whom he had been rejected." Others of the Judges expressed themselves to the same effect.

No. 147.
June 28, 1876.
Lockyer v. Ferryman, &c.

The pursuer's action, then, of 1842, after the fullest investigation, and after a keen and protracted litigation, failed on both the grounds on which he relied, and final decree of absolvitor was pronounced by this Court on the 3d March 1846. The pursuer took an appeal to the House of Lords, but after considerable delay he failed to follow it forth, and the appeal was finally dismissed by the House of Lords in February 1850. The result of these judgments was to find that the pursuer and Miss Janet Sinclair were not and never had been married persons; that both of them were single and unmarried and free to marry any person with whom they might choose to contract.

The final judgment of the Court pronounced in 1846 stood unimpugned and unchallenged for thirty years until the present action was raised on 9th August 1875. Miss Janet Sinclair died on 18th June 1870, understood and reputed to be an unmarried person, and as such she executed as her will a trust-disposition and settlement in favour of Mr Ferryman and others, the present defenders, who are her representatives administering her estate in terms of the settlement. The aunt and sister of the said Miss Janet Sinclair, who were the principal witnesses in the action of 1842, are also now dead, and it cannot but be that after the lapse of thirty-seven years from the date of the occurrences in dispute death must have removed many of the persons who might possibly have thrown light upon, or given evidence regarding, the occurrences which then took place.

It is in these circumstances that the pursuer now, in 1876, seeks to open up the decree of absolvitor pronounced in 1846. He asks this Court to re-try the whole question which formed the subject of keen and protracted litigation thirty years ago. He demands that the question whether there was any marriage between him and the late Janet Sinclair in 1839 shall be investigated into and determined of new, just as if no proceedings had taken place during the four years 1842 to 1846, and just as if he was now raising the question for the first time. He now proposes to lead new evidence to prove (apparently principally by hearsay of witnesses who are now dead) facts and circumstances which he failed to prove in 1842. He says he will establish that Miss Sinclair's aunt and sister, who were examined and cross-examined at such length in 1843 and 1844, gave false evidence—that the late Miss Sinclair herself induced them to do so, or conspired with them that they should swear falsely, and he now asks the Court to declare, after Miss Janet Sinclair's death, that she was the wife of the pursuer in 1839, and that the pursuer now, as her surviving husband, has right under the contract of marriage to Miss Sinclair's whole means and estate, heritable and moveable. In short, having failed to substantiate the marriage during Miss Sinclair's life he proposes to do it now that she is dead, to the effect of carrying off her whole property. The demand is a very startling one—I think I may say that it is unprecedented—and it would require to be supported by very strong and special grounds.

No. 147.
June 28, 1876.
Lockyer v. Ferryman, &c.

I am of opinion that the pursuer has failed to state any relevant or sufficient grounds for setting aside the final decree of 1846, that the pursuer is not entitled now to raise or try the questions embraced in this action, and that the defenders are entitled to decree of absolvitor. I am therefore for adhering to the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

The first plea relied on by the defenders is that the judgment of 1846 constitutes res judicata between the parties and their representatives; that that judgment is binding upon the present pursuer, and that he is barred and estopped thereby from trying over again the question which was then, after full trial, finally decided against him. I think this plea is well founded.

It is not and cannot be disputed that the litigation which went on from 1842 to 1846 was a litigation before a competent tribunal—a litigation in which all the proper parties took part, and in which the questions raised were fairly and fully contested. It was in no sense a collusive lawsuit and litigation in which there was only a pretended contest, and in which, as happened in some of the cases cited at the bar, the pretended antagonists really concurred in obtaining the decision, and the Court was deceived and entrapped into pronouncing a judgment which both parties knew the facts would not justify. Collusion, in the proper sense of the word, is out of the question. There was certainly no collusion in the litigation between the pursuer and the late Miss Janet Sinclair. Instead of collusion there was the keenest, the most strenuous, the most bitter, opposition. Every point was contested. The parties were represented by the ablest counsel then at the bar. No plea was omitted—no averment susceptible of proof was forgotten—every point was contested. In the proof every possible advantage was sought by the pursuer, and every objection to evidence which the pursuer or his advisers thought they might beneficially take was rigorously and even vexatiously insisted in. If the pursuer lost the case finally in 1846, it was not for want of strenuous litigation. Everything that skill and perseverance and energy could do for him was done, and if the judgment of 1846 is not to be final I can hardly conceive that finality can be predicated of any judgment whatever of any Court.

But the pursuer by his counsel boldly maintained that in a consistorial cause, such as a declarator of marriage or of legitimacy, or of bastardy, or of putting to silence, there is not and never can be any such thing as a res judicata, at least where the judgment denies or negatives the alleged marriage; and this contention was supported by an argument, the learning, the research, and the ingenuity of which I could not but admire, and my admiration was only increased when I felt the hopelessness of the effort.

No. 147. June 28, 1876. Lockyer v. Ferryman, &c.

The contention was that by the canon law in matrimonial suits there never is and never can be res judicata, at least where the judgment is against the alleged marriage, and it is urged that the canon law on such a subject is the law of Scotland. There is only one text on the subject in the canon law itself, that is in the Corpus Juris Canonicum. It occurs in Decretum, book ii. tit. 27, law 7, and although expressed in general terms, the case, and the only case, given is one of a collusive decree, obtained by the device of both the parties, who had combined in deceiving the ecclesiastical Court and in surreptitiously obtaining a decree. The general rule contended for by the pursuer can only be gathered from the dicta of certain canonists or commentators upon the canon law; and indeed the chief authority relied upon is that of Sanchez in his work De Matrimonio, and I think most, if not all, the writers quoted by Mr Fraser either merely follow the dicta of Sanchez or explain and modify or extend them. I do not think it necessary to enter upon the extremely interesting inquiry into which Mr Fraser led us as to the bearing and extent of the rule which certainly seems to have prevailed among the canonists, that in certain matrimonial causes, and in certain circumstances, the plea of res judicata—that is, the finality of the judgment of a Court—was not admitted. A distinction was taken between judgments in favour of marriage pro matrimonio and judgments against marriage contra matrimonium. In the former the matter transit in rem judicatum, in the latter not; but even in the former case there were exceptions, as where a marriage was affirmed or declared between parties alleged to be within the forbidden degrees. There seems to have been other exceptions and sub-exceptions, and, as usual in such cases, successive writers give play to their ingenuity and subtlety in refining and distinguishing the most shadowy differences. All this is very interesting, but it has really no bearing on the present case, for nothing is more hopeless than to maintain that the dicta or disquisitions of canonical commentators are or ever were the law of Scotland. Even the canon law itself, at least since the Reformation, forms no part of the law of Scotland. Even before the Reformation the weight of authority seems to shew that the canon law had not per se the force of law, at least where contradicted by local ordinances or customs; and since the Reformation I think it perfectly clear, in the words of Lord Stair, and no higher authority can be cited, that in Scotland the canon law and its rules and principles "have not the authority of law, and therefore are only received according to their equity and expediency secundum bonum et æquum,"—Stair i. 1, 16. If this be true of the canon law itself—of the Corpus Juris Canonicum—it is much more true of the treatises of the canonists and canonical commentators. Most certainly everything that Sanchez says is not the law of Scotland. It would be startling, indeed, if it were; and although in matrimonial questions, and in questions relating even indirectly to church law, the canon will always be listened to with respect, I am not sure that the same can always be said of the dicta of Sanchez, or of the crowd of commentators who either preceded or followed him. Speaking for myself, and without claiming more than a very slight acquaintance with this class of writers, I am almost inclined to say that when a dictum or principle can only be supported by Sanchez or by his followers, it is rather a ground of suspicion and a call for scrutiny, than a reason for acceptance as part of the law of Scotland.

It is satisfactory to think that the reasons given for the alleged canonistic rule against the operation of res judicata have no place in the law of Scotland. The salus animæ, the safety or eternal welfare of the soul, the mitigation or the shortening of the pains of purgatory, and similar reasons, cannot be listened to here and now. Such considerations are foreign not only to our law, but to our modes of thinking, and dicta which rest upon such considerations have only to be examined to be laid aside. If the plea of res judicata is to be met and overcome it must be in a different manner and on far different grounds.

I am of opinion, then, that by the law of Scotland the rule of res judicata is as completely and as fully applicable to matrimonial, divorce, and consistorial causes as to any other class of causes whatever. No good reason can be given why there should be any difference. Nay, if the nature and specialties of consistorial suits, particularly suits having for their end to constitute, to negative, or to dissolve marriage, be taken into account, there is even more reason why, in a fairly and fully tried cause, honestly contested, and fought out to the end, the sentence should be definitive and final. Uncertainty, liability to question, doubt, possibility of change, or reversal, are far more to be deprecated in questions relating to marriage than almost anywhere else, and the social misery and confusion which would or which might result if it were impossible to fix and settle such questions can hardly be estimated. A mere pecuniary award, or even the adjudication of an estate, is or may be comparatively a small matter compared with the final knitting or the final severance of nuptial ties—the separation of families and the status, legitimate or otherwise, of innocent offspring.

Wherever, therefore, there has been an honest, fair, and fully fought litigation, as in the present case—wherever the proper parties, the only proper parties, and all the proper parties, have honestly and without collusion, whether obstinately or not, fought out their rights before a competent Court, and in a competent manner, then, as between these parties so litigating, I think the judgment obtained, acquiesced in, or affirmed on appeal, has and must have the force of res judicata. The question is settled, the judgment has gone forth, and that same question is not to be fought over again between the same parties, and in the same way, and thus judgment made not the ending but the beginning of strife. For the pursuer's contention really is that the suit is to be interminable; no matter how many judgments are pronounced, the pursuer (for he does not concede the same privilege to the defender) can simply try again, taking his chance of new evidence or variations in the mode of giving evidence, of new witnesses or the absence of old witnesses, of a new jury or a new Judge, of changes in the law or changes in opinion, and this not even to be ended by the death of the parties, but it may go on for ever as between their representatives.

I cannt listen to such a contention, and I reject without hesitation the pursuer's proposition that there can be no such thing as res judicata in matrimonial or divorce suits. In the present case I hold it perfectly clear that whatever was really and competently decided after full and honest litigation in the action of 1842 must now be held in the fullest sense of the words to be res judicata against the pursuer.

But the pursuer next contends that although the final decree of 1846 may be

No. 147.
June 28, 1876.
Lockyer v. Ferryman, &c.

res judicata in so far as it finds that there was no marriage constituted by the interchange of present consent, it cannot constitute res judicata so as to find that there was no marriage constituted by promise subsequente copula, for the pursuer maintains that this separate ground of action was not competently embraced in the action of 1842, and was not competently adjudicated upon by the Court. He maintains that the averments which he himself made in his first action as to the alleged marriage having been consummated, and as to intercourse having taken place between the parties, were incompetently made—that all these averments should have been struck out of the record—that no proof should have been allowed regarding them, and that the Judges in the first action should have laid these averments and the proof by which they were attempted to be supported altogether out of view.

Now, I cannot agree with the pursuer in this view of the case. It is true that in the original summons no precise averment was made of consummation, and no particulars were given as to time or place. But there was a general averment that after the alleged marriage the pursuer and the late Miss Sinclair "considered themselves as married, and conducted themselves towards each other as husband and wife."

A general averment of this kind was all that was necessary to be made in a summons drawn according to the old form, and the very object of the condescendence, and the revised condescendence which were afterwards allowed, was that this general averment might be made specific, that full details might be supplied, and that the pleas in law arising upon the facts might be separately deduced, and I think it was perfectly competent for the pursuer to introduce into his revised condescendence, and to place upon the closed record, the specific allegations upon which he ultimately relied, and the pleas in law he deduced therefrom. No objection was taken to his doing so. Issue was distinctly joined between him and the late Miss Sinclair upon these very averments. In that proof the pursuer endeavoured to substantiate them, and although doubtless in this he signally failed, still I cannot doubt the competency of the averments and of the proof, and it is hardly possible to read the opinions of the Judges without feeling that, had the pursuer succeeded in establishing what he averred, the decision of the cause would probably have been quite different from what it was.

Still further, I think that the pursuer is now completely barred from maintaining that these averments were incompetently made in the first action. It was the pursuer himself who made them; he claimed right to do so, and his right was allowed. He asked a proof of them, and the proof was granted to him. He went to judgment upon those averments and upon that proof, and it is impossible now to allow him to plead that these averments were incompetent, that the proof relative thereto should have been excluded, and that the judgment thereon, which he himself demanded, was incompetently pronounced. I am not moved by the judgment in Dallas v. Mann. There the objection was taken in the original action, and was sustained in the original action, leaving it to the pursuer to bring a new action upon new grounds. It led to a simple dismissal of the cause—that is, the party was expressly allowed or required to bring a new action—and there never was or could be any res judicata. But the principle applied in Dallas v. Mann is inapplicable to the present case, in which the detailed averments were quite rightly and competently put upon the closed record.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the final judgment of 1846 forms, in the highest sense of the words, res judicata against the pursuer. It decided against him the very questions which he now seeks to raise, and disposed definitively and precisely of all the grounds upon which he now seeks to rest the present action. His demand is—I think it is impossible to disguise it—to try over again in 1876 the very same questions, and upon the very same grounds, which were adjudicated upon in foro contentiossimo in 1846.

Now, without saying that a decree in foro can never be got rid of, it is enough to say that when once a proper res judicata is established, as in the present case, it can only be avoided on very special and specific grounds. What those grounds are belong to a subsequent branch of the pursuer's case.

There is another ground on which the defenders rely as excluding the present action, and that is, that under the Instructions to Commissaries issued in 1563 the lapse of a year and day from the date of the final decree excludes all subsequent challenge thereof. Now, I admit that there is great room for doubt as to the nature and effect of the Instructions to the Commissaries, and in particular of the special Instruction upon which this plea is founded. It is a general principle that decrees in absence may be opened up, even although proof has been led, for a decree in absence is not res judicata in the strict sense, or even although there be causa cognita, because there has been no contract of litis contestatio, there has been no appearance for the defender. Now, one can see the extreme importance of fixing at least some limit within which a party who does not choose to appear in a consistorial cause may be barred from appearing and challenging a decree after the other party has proceeded upon the faith of it. I think that was the actuating principle upon which the three decisions founded upon by the defenders were founded, and I cannot lay these decisions aside. I feel myself bound by them as establishing a most salutary rule. It is true the regulations apply to all kinds of actions in the Commissary Court, and appear to be applicable to other than mere matrimonial causes; and although, as to other causes, they are not now observed, still, as to matrimonial suits, there was a very great desirability in reducing finality within a fair period. I am not prepared to say that I would not apply these three cases as a fair rule to consistorial causes, fixing a year as the period after which a decree in absence at any rate should not be opened up, except on very special cause shewn indeed. But while I cannot discard the principle founded on the lapse of year and day, I think it does not apply to the present case, or to any case which has been decided between the parties as the present case has. For the moment a decree is pronounced in foro contentioso it is res judicata. It may be reviewed if a Court of review is open; it may be appealed if it is an appealable judgment; but it cannot be disregarded as a judgment. If it is affirmed on review or appeal then it is res judicata, though only a month has elapsed; or indeed it is res judicata the moment a final judgment is pronounced which is acquiesced in or not taken to review. Therefore this rule of year and day does not apply in the least to the judgment in the present case. Its effect upon other rules I shall not say anything of. I think that part of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor need not enter into our judgment.

And this brings me to the next question in the case, which is this, has the pursuer set forth relevant and sufficient grounds upon which a valid or effectual res judicata can be got over? I quite agree with your Lordship in the chair on this part of the case. No doubt a decree in foro may sometimes be set aside and the cause be re-tried. The best instance is the case put in illustration—that of a decree or judgment in foro obtained by collusion of the parties. I entertain no doubt whatever that, if parties combine to get a judgment, the judgment so got by their collusion, or by deceiving the Judge by the appearance of a contest which does not really exist, will not stand as res judicata against any one, or against anybody. I also go along with your Lordship in holding that a judgment obtained by fraud cannot be pleaded upon by the party guilty of that fraud. And that raises what to my mind is the real difficulty in this case: Has the pursuer set forth specific averments of fraud, which, if he proves them, would entitle him to set aside this decree and to try the cause over again? Now, I agree with your Lordship in the chair in all the remarks which you have made upon this point. I do not think that any of the grounds relied upon by the pursuer are sufficient.

No. 147. June 28, 1876. Lockyer v. Ferryman, &c.

I think the grounds may be classified into four heads. He says the witnesses spoke falsely—were perjuring themselves by speaking what was not true. Now, it is quite plain that that by itself is not a ground for setting aside a judgment. There is contradictory evidence in almost every jury trial, and cases of perjury are not unfrequent in cases where strenuous disputes arise regarding matters of fact; but it is for the jury in each case to judge which of the witnesses to believe and which to disbelieve. And it is quite vain for a party who has been unsuccessful in one trial to say, I want another jury before whom I will prove that certain witnesses have perjured themselves. That must be settled not in a subsequent case but in the case itself, and means are provided by allowing additional or conjunct proof for exposing or detecting such perjury. Then the pursuer next says that at the time the first case was tried he could not get some witnesses. That is not a good ground for setting aside res judicata. He ought to have stated how he could not get them at the time. And it is extremely material to bear in mind, as several of your Lordships have noticed, that all the averments remitted to probation in this case were proper facts within the pursuer's own knowledge, about which he must have known fully and truly whether they were true. He cannot say therefore that in anything that was proved he was taken by surprise, although he may have been surprised at the testimony; and if he was taken by surprise at the testimony he ought to have protested for reprobators, as it is called, and claimed an opportunity of contradicting it. He actually had an abundant and long delay and a conjunct probation, and all that he now avers should have been brought out at the time. He says further that he could not get some witnesses, or that some witnesses were not adduced; but that was a thing he ought to have complained of at the time, and the proper remedy would have been applied. He would have got whatever time was necessary, and a compulsitor to secure the attendance of witnesses. And now, after the lapse of thirty years, he comes and says that he has got information which he did not possess before. I do not think that it is materially different from the last. Information as to the facts he cannot have got in the sense of their being new—what he means is that he has got new witnesses about them, and found out things afterwards which he might have brought forward in 1846, but did not bring. This is his own fault. It is quite plain upon this record that there were plenty of witnesses who could have proved most material points of his averments if they had been true, and if he had chosen to bring them—keepers, coachmen, ostlers, and others at Duntreath, regarding whom it must be presumed he should have known, and the Rev. M. Thoms and others, to whom it is said statements were made by Miss Janet Sinclair. He proposes to bring all these witnesses now because he did not bring them in 1846. It is impossible to sustain that as a ground for opening up res judicata. If he was taken by surprise, there was ground for moving for a new trial at that time; but now, after acquiescing in the judgment for a period of thirty years, he is moving for a new trial. The last ground upon which he asks this res judicata to be opened up—and that is the only ground upon which I have the least difficulty—is that Miss Janet Sinclair herself was guilty of subornation of perjury,—that is, in inducing her sister and aunt to swear to what they knew to be untrue. Now, I concur with your Lordships that this averment is not relevantly or sufficiently made. That they did conspire (as stated in the amendment which the pursuer has made) together to give false evidence is not nearly enough in an inquiry of this kind. It is not said that there was any bribe given them, or any inducement of any kind offered for them to come forward and swear falsely. All that can be said against Miss Janet Sinclair is that, perhaps, she sat by and heard, or that perhaps she knew, what they were to swear to from having conversation with them. Is that the proof we are going to? I do not think that is a sufficient allegation of subornation of perjury. Besides, it would require to be shewn that that perjured information was material in the judgment of 1846. Now, when I look at the opinions of the Judges in that case I find that they chiefly went upon the correspondence and upon what the parties meant by the interchange of these written de præsenti consents; for there was also a marriage-contract that passed between the parties. That was the chief averment in the case; and the opinions of all the Judges go upon the correspondence chiefly, as shewing that the parties by these de præsenti written consents did not intend verum matrimonium. That was the ground of decision in 1846—not any particular statement made by these witnesses, now said to be perjured, and to be suborned by Miss Janet Sinclair—and it is out of the question to allow this averment, even had it been much more specific in itself, to go to proof, to the effect of letting in a new case altogether, and thus to enable the pursuer to attack a judgment which did not rest on the alleged perjured testimony at all, but which was perfectly well supported on other and separate grounds. The conclusive answer to the pursuer getting into these matters now is lapse of time and the change of circumstances which have occurred. Why has this matter lain over for thirty years? Why has the pursuer waited until all the witnesses are dead? Why has he waited until death has covered with oblivion all the circumstances not recorded in the former proof, when no party materially acquainted with these facts can be got to speak to them, and he can only get proof of the alleged perjury of the two witnesses and of the alleged subornation by Miss Janet Sinclair by the hearsay evidence of other witnesses who are now dead. I think lapse of time here is sufficient. No party is entitled to lie by for thirty years, and then, when the other party is dead and circumstances have escaped the memory so that it has become impossible to prove them by essential witnesses, to raise the question in a new state of the law, under new circumstances, before new Judges, and with different parties. I think the lapse of time is a sufficient answer, even if the averments by which the pursuer seeks to get rid of res judicata had been far more definite and specific than they are, or the pursuer can possibly make them. Upon the whole of these grounds I think the judgment of the Lord Ordinary ought to be adhered to.

No. 147.
June 28, 1876.
Lockyer v. Ferryman, &c.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"In respect it is unnecessary to decide the question raised by the defenders in their first plea in law, recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary of 13th February 1876, in so far as it sustains that plea: Quoad ultra adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against, with additional expenses, &c.

WILLIAM SPINK, S.S.C.—HAMILTON, KINNEAR, & BEATSON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 148.

June 30, 1876.
Batchelor v. Pattison and Mackersy.

ALEXANDER BATCHELOR, Pursuer.—Party.
GEORGE HANDASYDE PATTISON, Defender.—D.-F. Watson—Black.
WILLIAM MACKERSY, Defender.—Burnet.

Advocate.—Held that a counsel in the conduct of a cause is entitled to use his own discretion even against the instructions of his client, and that an allegation by the client that he has sustained loss in consequence is not relevant to support a claim of damages against the counsel.

Agent and Client.—Although, generally, an agent is bound to follow the instructions of his client, when the conduct of a cause is in the hands of counsel the agent is bound to act according to the directions of counsel, and will not be answerable to his client for what he does bona fide in obedience to such directions.

Observations on the duties and liabilities of counsel and agents.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Midlothian. M.

THIS was an action raised in the Sheriff Court of Midlothian by Alexander Batchelor against William Mackersy, W.S., and George Handasyde Pattison, advocate. The conclusions were for payment of £409, 15s., "being loss and damage sustained by the pursuer by and through the wilfulness, maliciousness, gross negligence, systematic disregard of instructions, and ill-guided recklessness, or one or other of them, on the part of the defenders, the said William Mackersy as agent, and the other defender employed by him as counsel, or of one or other of them, in their management or conduct of an action in the Court of Session."

The Sheriff-substitute having ordered condescendence and defences, the pursuer made the following statement:—The pursuer's father, who died in 1848, left a trust-disposition and settlement by which he directed his trustees, on his wife's death, to divide his property equally among his six children. His wife died in 1855, and therefore the pursuer became entitled to one-sixth of the trust-estate. The pursuer was then abroad, and did not return for many years. (Cond. 2.) "The pursuer had never received his one-sixth share of his father's estate, and being unable to get an accounting from the trustees of their intromissions therewith he instructed Mr Robert Broatch, writer, Dalbeattie, to get the necessary proceedings raised before the Court of Session for that purpose. Mr Broatch, consequently, employed the defender, William Mackersy, to raise an action before said Court in the year 1869. The said William Mackersy accepted of the employment." (Cond. 3.) "The pursuer had, for a consideration, on 14th April 1869, granted an assignation of his said one-sixth share to Francis Suttie—(Suttie granted a retrocession on 12th August 1873)—and Mr Mackersy, in pursuance of said employment, raised an action before the Court of Session at the said Francis Suttie's instance, as assignee of the pursuer, against the following parties, viz.—(1) John Robertson and Alexander Lindsay, the only surviving and accepting trustees, original and assumed, of the pursuer's father; and (2) the said Alexander Lindsay, as an individual." (Cond. 4.) "The truster left at his death certain moveable effects and considerable heritable property in Dundee. The heritable property was exposed to sale, by public roup, on 16th May 1855, and it was sold at a reduced value to the said Alexander Lindsay. In the course of the proceedings before Lord Ormidale the sale was, on 7th February 1871, found to be illegal, and his Lordship ordained the said Alexander Lindsay to lodge an account of his intromissions with the rents he had drawn from said property from Whitsunday 1855." (Cond. 5.) "About the time that said order was pronounced to account, the defender, William Mackersy, changed his counsel, and employed the other defender, George Handasyde Pattison, as counsel. It was about this time also that the wilfulness, maliciousness, gross negligence, systematic disregard of instructions, and ill-guided recklessness, in the management or conduct of said proceedings before the Court of Session, began, of one or more of which the defenders, or one or other of them, have been culpably guilty." (Cond. 6.) "In carrying out said accounting, and, with the view to the proper ascertainment of the pursuer's one-sixth share of his father's estate, the defender, William Mackersy, was instructed to get the heritable property sold by public roup, as directed by the trust-deed. Instead of obeying these instructions, the defenders did, both of them, wilfully and recklessly, consent to a remit to a pretended man of skill, to value and report upon the heritable subjects. Against this the pursuer remonstrated. Notwithstanding the defenders lodged a minute craving such a remit, and by interlocutor of 23d January 1872 the Lord Ordinary made a remit accordingly. The defender, George Handasyde Pattison, was well aware of the instructions that had been given for a sale of the subjects. The pursuer's interests were prejudiced by this remit, and it would have been greatly to his profit had there been a sale instead of a remit." (Cond. 7.) "After said remit had been made, and report obtained and lodged in process, the Lord Ordinary, by interlocutor of 14th May 1872, allowed the report to be seen, and the parties to lodge a note of objections thereto, within eight days. The pursuer . . . instructed the defender, William Mackersy, to lodge objections to the report, and crave a proof or a remit to another architect, if proof could not be got after the remit had once been made, so as to shew that the subjects had been undervalued to the extent of £252, and the alleged meliorations and additions thereon overvalued, to the extent of £121, all to the pursuer's loss to the extent of one-sixth of £373, and the profit of the defender, Alexander Lindsay, in said action. But these instructions the defender, William Mackersy, wilfully, recklessly, and negligently disregarded, and lodged no objections. These instructions were repeatedly given." (Cond. 8.) "In accounting for the rents, the said Alexander Lindsay debited himself with the amounts thereof, as appeared from the valuation-roll of the burgh of Dundee, amounting, from Whitsunday 1855, to £586, 19s. On inquiry at the tenants it was found that, in almost every instance, each tenant had paid much more than his rent was stated to be in the valuation-roll. The defender, William Mackersy, was consequently instructed to get a proof, or a remit, to examine the tenants and Lindsay, and recover receipts and rentals, so as to ascertain the true amounts of the rents Lindsay had drawn. After considerable and unaccountable delay a remit was made only to recover receipts and rentals, but not to examine the tenants. The pursuer remonstrated against such a limited remit, and again instructed that the remit should be extended to an examination. The other defender, G. H. Pattison, was made aware of this instruction, but would not, at least did not, obey it,—this most negligently, and wilfully, recklessly, and by crassa negligentia, and unskilfulness." (Cond. 9.) "A remit being thus obtained to recover receipts, rentals, and other documents, it was carried through by the said Robert Broatch, who succeeded in recovering a great variety of receipts and rentals; but many of the tenants had not receipts, and those and the rentals recovered were of a very confused nature, and instructions were again given to get a remit to examine the tenants orally, so as to supply the defects of the missing receipts, and explain those recovered. Still these instructions were disregarded by both defenders, most wilfully and recklessly, to the pursuer's loss to the extent of at least one-sixth of £200." (Cond. 10.) "The said William Mackersy laid the receipts, &c., recovered under said remit, before Messrs Robertson, chartered accountants, Edinburgh, who reported that the excess of rents amounted to £392, 10s. 5d., exclusive of interest as it accumulated from Whitsunday 1855." (Cond. 11.) "This the defender,

No. 148.

June 30, 1876.
Batchelor v. Pattison and Mackersy.

No. 148. June 30, 1876. Batchelor v. Pattison and Mackersy.

William Mackersy, announced to the pursuer, who instructed him to get a judicial remit to an accountant, to report a state of accounts between the parties to the Court. This also the defender, William Mackersy, wilfully, recklessly, culpably, and negligently failed to do, and did not do. The instructions to get this done were given to the said William Mackersy repeatedly by letter." (Cond. 12.) "Instead of getting a remit to an accountant, in conformity with said instructions, the said William Mackersy by misrepresentations, prevailed on the said Robert Broatch to consent to the amount of rents accountable for by Lindsay being adjusted by counsel. Mr Broatch without any authority from his client, gave such consent, but in doing so stated that he had 'no authority to grant such a letter, and I grant it with great reluctance. It depends entirely on what Mr Pattison does whether the authority will be acquiesced in. If he proceeds on such a footing as not to meet with my client's approval my client will repudiate the authority, and engage the services of other agents and counsel.' After complaining that other things had been done in the cause contrary to express instructions the letter of authority proceeds,—'The result of Mr Pattison's adjustment is to be submitted to me before anything be done on it. That I condition in granting the authority.' The terms of this authority were duly communicated to the defender, G. H. Pattison. The pursuer was not aware that any such authority had been asked or given, and did not authorise it to be given. That authority, however, such as it was, was afterwards recalled, and instructions renewed to get a remit to an accountant as above stated. The defender, William Mackersy, wrote Mr Broatch that unless what counsel did was approved of it would not be acquiesced in, and, being unable to ascertain what was being done, so as to acquaint Mr Broatch therewith, he wrote Mr Broatch on 27th March 1873, with a copy letter he had sent Mr Pattison, recalling any authority he had to adjust the rents, and that anything he did would not be acquiesced in." (Cond. 13.) "Notwithstanding said recall of authority, or the terms in which it was granted, the defender, the said G. H. Pattison, most wilfully, maliciously, and recklessly, concurred in a joint minute which, in order to prevent the pursuer or his agent, Mr Broatch, seeing it, he lodged in process, on or about 2d April 1873, with his own hands, or by some one under his immediate directions and instructions, and paid the fee-fund dues thereof out of his own pocket. By said joint minute, which the pursuer and his agent repudiated so soon as they knew of its terms, the said excess of rents is admitted, by the said G. H. Pattison, to be only £120, without interest, instead of £392, 10s. 5d, as it was shewn by Messrs Robertson to be, with interest, and with whose report Mr Pattison was well acquainted, and he knew that said excess of rents was £392, 10s. 5d. at least. The interest on said £392, 10s. 5d. from Whitsunday 1855, calculated half-yearly, could not be less than £207, 9s. 7d. Instead of £120 it should thus have been £600, so that the pursuer's interests have been most wilfully, maliciously, and recklessly sacrificed, to the extent of at least one-sixth of £480, the difference." (Cond. 14.) "By said joint minute also, credit is given, most wilfully, and recklessly and maliciously, to the said Alexander Lindsay for alleged repairs on the said subjects, and alleged disbursements, which were neither justifiable by law, nor ever made nor vouched. This tended to diminish the pursuer's rights under said action to the extent of at least one-sixth of £200. The said William Mackersy was instructed and undertook to get said minute withdrawn from process, and he was put in funds to fee counsel for that purpose; but he wilfully failed to attend to this instruction, and did not even try to get the minute withdrawn, but allowed a remit to be made to an accountant to report a state of accounts, in terms of the said joint minute. The said G. H. Pattison was also written to on the subject, but he neither explained his conduct, nor tried to get the minute withdrawn; and he and Mr Mackersy were duly certiorated that they would be held liable in damages. . . . . The pursuer explains that at a meeting in Edinburgh between him, his agent Mr Broatch, and the defender Mackersy, on 6th May 1873, that defender undertook to get the minute withdrawn from process, and engage another counsel on being supplied with funds for that purpose. Money was sent for that purpose, but the defender Mackersy, instead of obeying these instructions, or notwithstanding the repudiation of the minute on 17th May 1873, procured a remit to Mr Jamieson, C.A., Edinburgh, to report a state of accounts in terms of said minute. The pursuer, Mr Suttie, and Mr Broatch, were in entire ignorance of this remit of 17th May 1873 till after it was pronounced. Thereafter the defender Mackersy's agency was recalled."

No. 148.
June 30, 1876.
Batchelor v. Pattison and Mackersy.

Both defenders lodged defences in which they denied the material averments of the pursuer. They both pleaded that the pursuer's allegations were not relevant.

Mr Pattison pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer has no title to sue. (2) The pursuer's allegations are irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the action. (3) This defender is entitled to absolvitor, in respect that his actings were not in any way contrary to or beyond his powers and duties as counsel.

Mr Mackersy pleaded, inter alia;—(6) The present defender having acted throughout under the instructions of counsel, and within his powers and duties as an agent, he ought to be assoilzied from the present action.

The Sheriff-substitute (Hallard) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuer's allegations are irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the action: Therefore dismisses it, and decerns: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses, of which allows an account," &c.

The Sheriff (Davidson) adhered.

The pursuer appealed, and argued, that his counsel and agent had mismanaged his case, and were liable in damages.

Argued for the defender Pattison;—A counsel was not bound to obey every instruction of his client. He might act for his client in every way which was within a counsel's province. He was entitled to enter into a judicial reference. The pursuer had objected to three things—(1) that counsel consented to a remit to an architect to value the property instead of insisting on a sale; (2) that after a report had been made counsel refused to demand a remit to another valuator; (3) that counsel did not ask for a parole proof of the amount of rents received by the purchaser of the property, but consented to a minute fixing the amount. Counsel was entitled to decide on the expediency and propriety of all these questions.[1]

Mr Mackersy, the other defender, argued that he had acted under the advice of counsel, and so was not answerable.[2]

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action of damages raised by a client against his counsel and agent in respect of alleged misconduct in an action in which the client was interested. The Sheriff-substitute has found the action irrelevant, and that

---

[1] Gilfillan v. Brown, March 8, 1833, 11 S. 548, 5 Scot. Jur. 597; Currie v. Glen, Dec. 19, 1846, 9 D. 308, 19 Scot. Jur. 101; Swinfen v. Lord Chelmsford, June 8, 1860, 5 Hurlston and Norman, 890, 2 L. J. Exch. 382.

[2] Megget v. Thomson, Feb. 2, 1827, 5 S. 275; Landale v. Tod, Jan. 13, 1831, 9 S. 268, 3 Scot. Jur. 162; Cates v. Indermaur, 1858, 1 Foster and Finlason, 259.

No. 148. June 30, 1876. Batchelor v. Pattison and Mackersy.

judgment has been affirmed by the Sheriff. The case is now before this Court; and as the case is of a very rare description—one, I think, almost without a parallel in this Court—it is necessary to lay down the principles by which it must be decided.

An advocate in undertaking the conduct of a cause in this Court enters into no contract with his client, but takes on himself an office in the performance of which he owes a duty, not to his client only, but also to the Court, to the members of his own profession, and to the public. From this it follows that he is not at liberty to decline, except in very special circumstances, to act for any litigant who applies for his advice and aid, and that he is bound in any cause that comes into Court to take the retainer of the party who first applies to him. It follows, also, that he cannot demand or recover by action any remuneration for his services, though in practice he receives honoraria in consideration of these services. Another result is, that while the client may get rid of his counsel whenever he pleases, and employ another, it is by no means easy for a counsel to get rid of his client. On the other hand, the nature of the advocate's office makes it clear that in the performance of his duty he must be entirely independent, and act according to his own discretion and judgment in the conduct of the cause for his client. His legal right is to conduct the cause without any regard to the wishes of his client, so long as his mandate is unrecalled, and what he does bona fide according to his own judgment will bind his client, and will not expose him to any action for what he has done, even if the client's interests are thereby prejudiced. These legal powers of counsel are seldom, if ever, exercised to the full extent, because counsel are restrained by consideration of propriety and expediency from doing so. But in such a case as this it is necessary to have in view what is the full extent of their legal powers.

The position of an agent is somewhat different. There is a contract of employment between him and his client, by virtue of which the client, for certain settled rates of remuneration, is entitled to require from the agent the exercise of care and diligence, and professional skill and experience. The general rule may fairly be stated to be that the agent must follow the instructions of his client.

But the general rule is subject to several qualifications. The agent, of course, cannot be asked to follow the client's instructions beyond what is lawful and proper. For the agent, as well as the counsel, owes a duty to the Court, and must conform himself to the rules and practice of the Court in the conduct of every suit. He is also bound by that unwritten law of his profession which embodies the honourable understanding of the individual members as to their bearing and conduct towards each other. But above all in importance, as affecting the present question, is the undoubted special rule that when the conduct of a cause is in the hands of counsel, the agent is bound to act according to his directions, and will not be answerable to his client for what he does bona fide in obedience to such directions.

Such being the general rules, it is now necessary to examine the record in order to see if the defenders in this case have acted in accordance with these rules. The pursuer is one of six children of a person of the name of Robert Batchelor, who left some property behind him at his death in 1848. This property was in the hands of trustees, and it appears that, with a view to a division of the property, certain heritable estate which belonged to the defunct was brought to sale on the 16th of May 1855, and was then bought by one of the trustees.

No. 148.
June 30, 1876.
Batchelor v. Pattison and Mackersy.

That sale and purchase were illegal, and although all the rest of the children of Mr Batchelor acquiesced in what was done and took their share of the estate, the pursuer, who had been absent from the country at the time, appeared after the lapse of a great many years, and insisted in having the sale declared to be illegal, with a view to ascertaining what his share of his father's property was. It is necessary to attend to the nature of the action said to be misconducted in order to judge of the force of the arguments made by and on behalf of the pursuer. There was a judgment pronounced in 1871 finding the sale to be illegal, and the consequence of that was undoubtedly that the pursuer was entitled to have an accounting upon the footing that the property was not properly valued at the price paid for it by the trustee who bought it, and to have the price divided as that should be ascertained. Now, the first complaint made upon the part of the pursuer is that his counsel and agent did not insist upon having the estate sold over again. That would, no doubt, have been one way to ascertain the true value of the estate; but it was not the only way, and it was not, in certain views, by any means the most expedient way of proceeding. Accordingly, it appears to me that it was quite a question for the consideration of the counsel in a case of this kind whether to insist upon a re-sale of the estate, or whether they should have a valuation; and the counsel, in the exercise of his discretion, thought that the latter course was preferable, and instructed the agent accordingly, and they both treated the case on the footing that there would be no re-sale, but a valuation. Now, this ground of complaint is an attempt by the client to make the counsel, and the agent acting under his instructions, answerable for the counsel's discretion in a matter eminently fitted for that discretion, and accordingly the irrelevancy of that complaint is at once apparent. I need hardly refer to the vituperative adjectives sprinkled so freely over the record, which do not add anything to the facts. If the facts are not of themselves sufficient, the mere use of abusive language will not have that effect. The next ground of complaint is this, that when a remit had been made to an architect to value the property, and the architect had made a report on the subject, the client and his country agent were anxious that that report should not be acquiesced in, but that the counsel and agent should ask the Lord Ordinary to allow proof, or to remit the matter to another architect—not for any reason alleged on record of any corruption or misconduct on the part of the architect to whom the remit had been made, but simply because the client had been dissatisfied. Now, I need hardly say to your Lordships that if any counsel had been so ill-advised as to make such a motion to the Lord Ordinary, he would not have succeeded, and that no proof would have been allowed, and no fresh remit made. If the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor had come before your Lordships for review, you would have expressed an opinion that no such demand should have been granted. The complaint resolves into this, that the counsel and agent both did their duty.

The next matter is, what was the amount of rents intromitted with by the purchaser of the property, and a question arose how that was to be ascertained. An account had been given in by the trustee, and it is alleged that it had been found that much more had been paid by the tenants than the rents which were stated by the trustee as the amount contained in the valuation-roll, and accordingly it was alleged that the agent was instructed to get a proof, or a remit to examine the tenants and recover the receipts and rentals, so as to ascertain the true amount of the rents which had been drawn; that a remit was obtained, but only to recover the receipts and rentals, and not to examine the tenants; that the pursuer instructed the agent that the remit should be extended to an examination, and that Mr Pattison was informed of this, but would not, or at least did not, obey. It is impossible not to see that there would have been a great difficulty in making out any case for a proof at large. The incompetency of proving the receipt of rents in this way is evident to everybody of experience, and this was plainly a very absurd demand upon the face of it; but supposing it had been ten times more reasonable, it was a matter of discretion for the counsel, which he was entitled to decide for himself and his client—and he did decide it. That he was entitled to decide it is a matter of clear law.

No. 148.

June 30, 1876. Batchelor v. Pattison and Mackersy.

The next complaint is very much of the same description. It is alleged that the pursuer had ascertained, by inquiries of his own, from an accountant extra-judicially employed, that the report which had been made about the rents was by no means correct, and the pursuer says that he instructed Mr Mackersy to get a judicial remit to an accountant to report on this matter to the Court, but this he neglected to do. Without getting a remit in conformity with these instructions, as the pursuer alleges, Mr Mackersy prevailed on the country agent to consent to the amount of rents being adjusted by counsel—that is to say, by the counsel on each side. Mr Pattison was made fully aware of the pursuer's wishes, and yet, notwithstanding, he went on with the counsel on the other side to adjust the amount of rents for which Lindsay, the trustee, was to account. This is set out in the 12th article of the condescendence,—"Instead of getting a remit to an accountant, in conformity with said instructions, the said William Mackersy by misrepresentations prevailed on the said Robert Broatch to consent to the amount of rents accountable for by Lindsay being adjusted by counsel. Mr Broatch, without any authority from his client, gave such consent, but in doing so stated that he had 'no authority to grant such a letter, and I grant it with great reluctance. It depends entirely on what Mr Pattison does whether the authority will be acquiesced in. If he proceeds on such a footing as not to meet with my client's approval, my client will repudiate the authority, and engage the services of other agents and counsel.' After complaining that other things had been done in the cause contrary to express instructions, the letter of authority proceeds—'The result of Mr Pattison's adjustment is to be submitted to me before anything be done on it. That I condition in granting the authority.' The terms of this authority were duly communicated to the defender, G. H. Pattison." Then it is said that the authority was withdrawn, and that Mr Pattison was made aware of the withdrawal, yet that he went on to adjust the amount of rent for which Lindsay, the trustee, was to account. Now, here again there were several courses open. It was quite possible to have an inquiry, and to a certain extent there had been inquiry. Whether it was possible in the circumstances to carry any inquiry further we have not the means of knowing, but it was a very proper question to be settled by adjustment—there is no doubt about that—and that the counsel upon both sides should meet together and consider the matter upon fair and equitable grounds, and fix the amount for which the defender, the trustee, should be liable to the pursuer, was certainly a very advantageous and convenient mode of proceeding. That that was within the power of counsel, according to the exposition I have given regarding the powers of counsel, I do not suppose anybody can doubt. Mr Pattison was not only bona fide exercising his right, but he was doing it for the benefit and advantage of his client. Now, these are really the whole grounds of action. The conduct of the case was in the hands of Mr Pattison, who was entitled to decide what was to be done in regard to the whole of these matters. He did decide, and instructed Mr Mackersy to act according to his advice and direction. Mr Pattison himself is not answerable for the exercise of his own judgment in these matters; and Mr Mackersy, as agent, is not answerable because he acted under the instructions of Mr Pattison. Therefore I am clearly of opinion that the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, and the Sheriff affirming it, were just and well founded.

No. 148.

June 30, 1876.
Batchelor v. Pattison and Mackersy.

LORD DEAS, LORD ARDMILLAN, and LORD MURE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Refuse the appeal, and decern: Find the appellant liable in expenses; allow accounts," &c.

PARTY—WM. SAUNDERS, S.S.C.—GEO. BEGG, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 149.

June 30, 1876.
Cumstie v. Cumstie's Trustees.

ALEXANDER CUMSTIE, Pursuer.—D.-F. Watson—Kinnear.
DAVID PHILIP AND OTHERS (Arthur Cumstie's Trustees), Defenders.—Thoms—J. A. Reid.

Succession—Vesting—Fee and Liferent.—A testator conveyed heritage to his son in liferent, for his liferent use allenarly, and to his heirs whomsoever in fee. The son survived his father, and, after executing a disposition of the subjects to testamentary trustees, died without issue. In an action of declarator by his heir of line, held that the son's right was one of liferent only, and that the pursuer had right to the subject—(diss. Lord Deas, who held that the words "liferent use allenarly" were to be read as restricting the son's right to a liferent only for the protection of the heirs of his body and not of other heirs whomsoever who were not personæ prædilectæ, and that in the circumstances the son's disposition carried the subject.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Rutherfurd Clark. B.

WILLIAM CUMSTIE, merchant, died in 1852, possessed of two heritable subjects in Oban. He had purchased the first and taken a disposition from the seller in the following terms:—"To and in favour of the said William Cumstie, and Mrs Jean Harriot or Cumstie, his spouse, and the longest liver of them two, in liferent, for their liferent use allenarly, and after the death of the longest liver to and in favour of James Cumstie, merchant in Oban, Arthur Cumstie, merchant there, and Alexander Cumstie, merchant there [his sons], equally betwixt them, in liferent, for their liferent use allenarly, and the respective heirs whomsoever of the said James Cumstie, Arthur Cumstie, and Alexander Cumstie, equally betwixt them, in fee, heritably and irredeemably."

William Cumstie's title to the other subject was a feu-charter, and he executed a disposition of it, in which the destination was identical with the former, except that the name of another son Peter was substituted for that of Alexander.

Infeftment followed in William Cumstie's lifetime in favour of the parties in liferent and fee respectively.

Mrs Cumstie survived her husband only a few days, and she was survived by his four sons.

Arthur Cumstie died in 1874, leaving a widow but no issue. He had executed a disposition of his third share of both properties to trustees.

Alexander Cumstie, his immediate younger brother, raised this action against the trustees, concluding for declarator that he had right to the fee of the third share of the two subjects destined to the heirs whomsoever of Arthur.

The pursuer pleaded;—The pursuer, as heir of line of the deceased

No. 149.
June 30, 1876.
Cumstie v. Cumstie's Trustees.

Arthur Cumstie, is entitled to the fee of the subjects, in respect that (1) under the destinations contained in the deeds of conveyance libelled, the said Arthur Cumstie was merely a fiduciary fiar, his heir of line being the beneficial fiar and disponee; (2) even if the said Arthur Cumstie was vested with the fee so as to open the same to the diligence of his onerous creditors, he was not entitled gratuitously to defeat the right of succession conferred upon his heirs, and therefore the conveyance of the said subjects by his trust-settlement was inept.

The pleas stated in defence were—(1) The said Arthur Cumstie was by feudal necessity the fiar of the subjects; or, otherwise, (2) Arthur Cumstie was a fiduciary fiar with a right to nominate the heirs to succeed him, and the defenders, as heirs so nominated, are entitled to the subjects in question.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels the defences: Finds and declares in terms of the conclusions of the libel: Finds the defenders, Arthur Cumstie's trustees, liable to the pursuer in expenses," &c.*

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—The fee was necessarily in the person of Arthur Cumstie. But it was said by the pursuers to be a fiduciary fee. The doctrine of a fiduciary fee was introduced by the case of Newlands.[1] But the principle of that case, and of Allardice,[2] only applied where the destination was to children nascituri. Then the testator selected his heir, and there was a necessity for a fiduciary fee to hold the subject for the heir. There could be no fiduciary fee unless there was a particular class of heirs in contemplation. Heirs whomsoever could not be regarded as personæ prædilectæ, and the present case fell rather within the principle followed in the case of Primrose,[3] where it was held that a tailzied destination came to an end when it opened to a person and his heirs whomsoever. Besides, "heirs whomsoever" included "hæredes facti."

The pursuer argued;—The Court will always give effect to a testator's intention if possible, and the clearly expressed intention here was to give Arthur Cumstie only a liferent. In the case of Frog's Creditors[4] that rule was to a certain extent departed from, owing to a supposed feudal necessity. But the subsequent case of Newlands decided that when the word "allenarly" was used the right would always be restricted to a liferent. There was no legal difficulty in a testator conferring a fee on the heirs whomsoever of a particular person either directly or through the means of a fiduciary fee. Assuming that there was a fiduciary fee in Arthur, it was unnecessary to discuss what effect that might have in a question with onerous creditors, who might plead that they found him apparently fiar on record. But at all events he could not alienate gratuitously.

---

* "NOTE.—The only defenders who have appeared are the trustees of Arthur Cumstie. They maintained that from legal necessity Arthur Cumstie was absolute fiar of a pro indiviso third of each of the two properties mentioned on record, or that if he was fiduciary fiar there was no restriction in the trust, inasmuch as he held for such persons as he might appoint to be his heirs. The Lord Ordinary cannot adopt either of these views. He thinks that Arthur Cumstie had a bare right of liferent only, and that his trust-settlement was not effectual either as a conveyance of the property or as a nomination of heirs. The Lord Ordinary has therefore given decree of declarator as concluded for."

[1] Newlands v. Newlands' Creditors, Feb. 7, 1794, aff. April 26, 1798, M. 4294, Ross, L. C., 3 L. R. 634, Bell's Fo. Ca. 54.

[2] Allardice v. Allardice, March 5, 1795, Ross, L. C., 3 L. R. 655, Bell's Fo. Ca. 156.

[3] Primrose v. Primrose, Feb. 9, 1854, 16 D. 498.

[4] Frog's Creditors v. his Children, Nov. 25, 1735, M. 4262, Ross, L. C., 3 L. R. 602.

It was absurd to say, as the defenders must do, that Arthur held a fiduciary fee only if he died leaving heirs of his body, but that in the contrary event he had all along held a fee-simple. The more distant the relationship the less likely it was that the liferenter should be held to be fiar, and it never had been so held except in cases of parent and child.

At advising,—

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I am not aware that there is any question—certainly not any important question—of fact involved in this case. The question of law involved, raised on the construction of the titles flowing from the late William Cumstie, is very important. The subjects in dispute are heritable, and the competition which has arisen relates to the share of the late Arthur Cumstie in these heritable subjects situated at Oban. There are two subjects, but the language of the titles is substantially the same in regard to both. William Cumstie, merchant in Oban, died in November 1852. He acquired by purchase from one David Jardine one of the two subjects, and the other he acquired by feu-charter from the Marquis of Breadalbane. In regard to both subjects the title is taken or granted to and in favour of William Cumstie and Jean Harriot or Cumstie, his spouse, and the longest liver of them, in liferent, for their liferent use allenarly, and after the death of the longest liver the one subject is conveyed to James, Arthur, and Alexander Cumstie, sons of William, and the other subjects are conveyed to James, Arthur, and Peter Cumstie, sons of William. In both cases, and in regard to both subjects, the conveyance to these sons is "equally betwixt them in liferent, for their liferent use allenarly, and the respective heirs whomsoever" of the three sons respectively named in the said deeds. Infeftment followed on both dispositions in favour of the parties in liferent and fee respectively in terms of the destination. Mrs William Cumstie, the wife of the granter of the deeds, died a few days after her husband. They were survived by the four sons named.

Arthur Cumstie, who, in terms of the deeds, had a liferent right allenarly in one-third of each of the subjects, died in September 1874, leaving a widow but no family. Alexander Cumstie, the pursuer of this action, was at the date of Arthur's death, and is now, the next younger brother and heir-at-law of the deceased Arthur Cumstie, and he has been served heir of provision to him accordingly.

By trust-disposition and settlement dated in June 1872 Arthur Cumstie conveyed to the defenders, as trustees, his whole heritable and moveable estate. The question now before the Court is raised in a competition between the pursuer, as brother and heir-at-law of Arthur Cumstie, and the defenders, as trust-disponees of Arthur Cumstie. The point of law involved is, Whether the subjects in Oban belonged to Arthur Cumstie in fee, and were thus effectually disposed of by him; or, Whether they belonged to Arthur Cumstie only for liferent, and for liferent use allenarly, and could not be disposed of by him?

There is no doubt that this question is attended with difficulty. Many interesting and important authorities have been quoted to us, and very many decisions are in the books closely touching and instructively illustrating the general point involved, though not the precise point at issue.

William Cumstie, the father of the pursuer and of Arthur Cumstie and the other brothers, was the proprietor in fee of one of these subjects, and the purchaser of the other, taking the title as he thought fit. It has never been disputed that William Cumstie and his wife, apart from his prior ownership, had under these deeds, and in terms of this destination, a liferent right allenarly. Then the conveyance is, on the death of the longest liver of the two spouses, to the three sons equally in liferent, for their liferent use allenarly, and the respective heirs whomsoever of each. There is no clause of survivorship. The heirs whomsoever of each deceasing son take the fee whenever the liferent of their father ceases. The Lord Ordinary has decided the question in favour of the pursuer—the heir whomsoever—the heir-at-law—the immediate younger brother, of Arthur. His Lordship's opinion is that Arthur had a bare right of liferent only, and that his trust-settlement was not effectual either as a conveyance of the property or as a nomination of heirs.

No. 149.
June 30, 1876.
Cumstie v. Cumstie's Trustees.

I concur in this opinion. It appears to me clear that unless Arthur Cumstie had the fee—the true fee—the absolute fee—these trust-disponees from him can have no title. That the trust-disposition operated as a nomination of heirs has not been contended by the defenders, and could not be contended with success. The conveyance to trustees, however reasonably granted, was a voluntary alienation. Unless Arthur had such a right of fee as could have been attached by his creditors he could not, in my opinion, legally and effectually execute a voluntary conveyance of his estate. No man can give away an estate which his creditors could not attach. If he could bestow it effectually he could not withhold it from creditors. I do not, however, think it has been contended that the creditors of Arthur could have effectually attached the fee of the estate, carrying it away from the heir, who is his brother, and might have been his son.

But then it is contended that, according to the terms of these deeds, and especially bearing in mind that the ultimate destination is to the heirs whomsoever of the respective sons, the right conferred on Arthur, though in words a liferent, must be considered as truly a fee, the true and absolute fee of the estate, to the effect of entitling him and enabling him to dispose of it at pleasure.

After much anxious consideration of all the authorities touching this question I am satisfied that the defenders' argument is not well founded.

Where a subject is conveyed to a father in liferent and his children nascituri in fee, and where the word "allenarly" or some clearly equivalent word has not been used, it has been long settled that the fee is in the father, though he is termed liferenter in the deed. This has been so repeatedly decided that I need not detain you by referring to the authorities. The rule has been introduced in consequence of the feudal maxim that the fee cannot be in pendente, and that, the granter being divested, the fee can be nowhere else than in the liferenter, and thus a result, not always according to the intention of the maker of the deed, has been accomplished by the pressure of this nicety of feudal law. I am not surprised that some of the earlier judgments were given with hesitation; but the point is now completely settled.

Where, however, the right of the person to whom the liferent is given is expressly qualified and limited by the words "for liferent use allenarly," the question is very different. In my opinion the person whose liferent is thus qualified by the words "for liferent use allenarly" is not the fiar—by which I mean, is not the substantial and absolute fiar with the power of a fiar to dispose of the subjects. I shall afterwards advert to the recognition of a fiduciary fiar. In the meantime I may observe that a fiduciary fee would not support the defenders' plea, because a fiduciary fiar is a trustee, and cannot effectually alienate the subject of the trust.

No. 149.

June 30, 1876
Cumstie v. Cumstie's Trustees.

I think the word "allenarly" was selected because of its simplicity and its power. I read the word as creating a very marked and stringent limitation of the word "liferent," as meaning "only a liferent," "a mere liferent," or, still more accurately, "a liferent and nothing more," which is, I think, the true meaning of the expression. A feudal exigency arising from the rule that a fee cannot be in pendente had led to the result that in certain cases a conveyance or destination in liferent was construed as conferring a fee on the person called a liferenter. But the addition of the word "allenarly" excluded such a result, and fixed the character of the liferenter, by declaring it to be only a mere liferent—a liferent and nothing more. Any attempt to found on the feudal maxim that a fee cannot be in pendente, so as to convert a right conferred as a liferent into a right of fee, is met and defeated by the force of the word "allenarly," because if the right be a liferent and nothing more it cannot be converted into a right of fee without violating the express words and clear meaning of the deed. It is the enixa voluntas of the maker of the deed that the right of liferent conferred with the qualifying word "allenarly" shall be a liferent and nothing more.

The views which I have now ventured to express are, I think, in accordance with a series of decisions subsequent to the case of Frog's Creditors, 25th November 1735, where the successful argument for the creditors was, that "if the disponer had intended to give the parent a bare liferent she would have used the word 'allenarly.'" This decision in the case of Frog's Creditors was given with regret, and has been regretted frequently since. The case of Newlands v. Newlands' Creditors, of which there are several reports, and one of much interest by Mr Ross, is too well-known to render it necessary for me at present to do more than very briefly advert to it. The case was most deliberately considered, and the effect of the word "allenarly" as qualifying and limiting the right of liferent was, I think, fully recognised. There was a difference of opinion, and, in particular, one very distinguished Judge differed from the judgment; but in so far as regards the meaning and effect of the word "allenarly" the judgment was clear, and it was affirmed. I am humbly of opinion that the authority of the decision has never since been shaken, and must now be held as conclusive. When the liferent has been by force of the qualifying words restricted so as to limit it to a bare liferent, then the doctrine of a fiduciary fee for the benefit of those to whom the beneficial fee was destined came to be introduced, and in the case of Newlands, and in the case of Allardice, and other cases, effect was given to it. In the case of Allardice there was a succession of liferenters allenarly, and the heirs of two sons in succession were declared to be fiars, and yet the law laid down in the case of Newlands was applied. In many subsequent cases the authority of these decisions has been fully recognised. Eminent lawyers have expressed their concurrence and approval. The opinion of Lord Corehouse in Mein v. Taylor, on 8th June 1827, 3 Ross' Leading Cases, 696, is most instructive. His judgment was adhered to by this Court and in this Division, and was affirmed in the House of Lords. This is what Lord Corehouse says—"When a conveyance is made to one in liferent, and his children unnamed or unborn in fee, it is settled law that the fee is in the parent, and that the children have only a hope of succession, to prevent the infringement of the feudal maxim that a fee cannot be in pendente. It is perhaps to be regretted that the point was so settled, because the plain intention of the maker is in consequence often sacrificed to a mere form of expression, and the feudal maxim might have been saved by supposing a fiduciary fee in the parent, as is done when the word 'liferent' is restricted by the word 'allenarly' or 'only.' Upon this point, however, it is too late to go back, but certainly the principle ought not to be extended to cases which have not yet been brought under it. . . . But where a fiduciary fee is given to a person, and it is directed that he himself shall enjoy the liferent, and still more clearly when a fiduciary fee is vested in several persons collectively and the survivor or survivors, and each of them separately is to have a liferent, such liferent must be construed a naked usufruct, in the same manner as if it had been qualified by the word 'allenarly'—See the case of Seton v. The Creditors of Hugh Seton, March 6, 1793."[1] This opinion of a most distinguished lawyer is extremely interesting. I think it cannot be doubted that, both as regards the effect of the word "allenarly" and as regards the recognition of a fiduciary fee, the decision in the case of Newlands is law at this day. It is to be observed that it was a case with creditors who attempted to attach the interest of a liferenter with a fiduciary fee. The creditors did not succeed. The fiduciary fee was a trust. Now, I have already explained that unless creditors could attach the right of Arthur Cumstie he himself could not alienate the subject by his voluntary deed. Therefore, on this part of the case, there can, I think, be no doubt that the decision in the case of Newlands is conclusive, and that the trust-disponees of the liferenter cannot succeed against the heir. The meaning of William Cumstie's deed is not doubtful, and it is according to justice and common sense that his intention should receive effect.

No. 149.

June 30, 1876. Cumstie v. Cumstie's Trustees.

But then it is maintained that the destination of the fee to the heirs whomsoever of Arthur Cumstie prevents the application of the law settled in regard to a liferent limited to a liferent allenarly. It is rightly urged that a destination to heirs whomsoever is just a destination to heirs as law may direct. That is quite true. A succession of heirs whomsoever is not a successio prædilecta. It is a successio provisione legis not provisione hominis. The flow of succession along the channel of heirs whomsoever is governed by law and not by the will of the maker of the deed. Thus there is no doubt that an entail is at an end when we come to heirs whomsoever. On this point there is abundance of authority. But it does not appear to me to follow from the admission of this law in regard to succession provisione legis that the heir-at-law, called under such a deed as this, is at the mercy of the party called as liferenter, and liferenter only. I fully accept the authority of cases such as Primrose[2] and many others in regard to a substitution in favour of heirs whomsoever. But that is not the question here. We have to deal with a question of liferent on which the meaning of the deed is not doubtful. The alternative is between the recognition, on the one hand, of the liferenter, who is restricted to a liferent allenarly as being, notwithstanding that restriction, a real and absolute fiar, whose creditors could attach the estate, and whose voluntary disposition could convey it,—and the recognition, on the other hand, of a fiduciary fee for the benefit of the heir-at-law. If Arthur Cumstie had had a child he would have been an heir whomsoever. The pursuer is his brother and his heir-at-law, and the trust-disponees of the liferenter are the only other competitors.

I appreciate the difficulty arising from the words "heirs whomsoever," for I have not been able to discover any case in which a fiduciary fee for the benefit of an heir-at-law—an heir whomsoever—has received effect. On the other hand, I am not aware of any case—and certainly none has been quoted to us—where it has been rejected; so the difficulty must be met on principle. In the case of children and grandchildren, and in the case of a succession of liferenters, the theory of a fiduciary fee has been accepted in order to prevent the consequence, the unreasonable consequence, of making a person fiar who is declared to be liferenter "allenarly." I can see no sufficient reason why it should not be accepted in this case where the parties competing for the fee are the heir-at-law of the liferenter to whom as heir whomsoever the fee is destined by the deed, and the trust-disponees of that liferenter, who, in respect of the restriction and limitation of his liferent, could not effectually grant the disposition. Unless Arthur was absolute fiar the defenders can have no case. I cannot hold that he had an absolute fee.

[1] M. 4219. [2] Supra, p. 922.

A conveyance to A and his heirs whomsoever confers on A the fee. A conveyance to A in liferent, and his children nascituri in fee, has also been found to confer on A the fee. This result was effected by force of a feudal maxim of Scottish law which forbids the fee to float on poised wing till it finds fitting settlement, and which demands that from the first the fee shall have a local habitation as well as a name.

The enforcement of this maxim by converting the liferent into a fee was not according to the intention of the maker of the deed. It was the triumph of a legal subtlety over the intention of the maker of the deed, and this was judicially felt and acknowledged in several of the earlier cases. But when by the use of the word "allenarly" a liferent was restricted and limited as I have already explained, the converting of that limited liferent into a fee would be clearly and strikingly opposed to intention. Some remedy was required to sustain intention, to disarm subtlety, and to vindicate the essential equity of law. This remedy was found. A new subtlety was evoked to redress the balance disturbed by the regretted enforcement of the former subtlety. A fiduciary fee in the person of the liferenter was recognised in order to sustain the intention—as I think, the clear intention—of the deed. A liferenter declared expressly to be a liferenter allenarly can never be held to be an absolute fiar. He is held to be a trustee, with only so much of the character of a fiar as is required to sustain the trust. He cannot alienate the estate, nor can the fee be attached by his creditors.

Accordingly, there has been no judgment and no authority presented to us for refusing effect to the word "allenarly."

I am not aware of any decision—I really do not think there has been any decision—in which a person to whom a subject was disponed in liferent, for liferent use allenarly, was notwithstanding that limitation found to be fiar—by which I mean absolute fiar having the power to alienate the subject. The case of Falconer v. Wright[1] is not a precedent or authority on this point. No doubt there the liferenter's right was limited by the word "allenarly," but then he was himself the disponer of the lands, and the infeftment on the conveyance to himself in liferent, for his liferent use allenarly, and to his children in fee, was blundered, no mention of the children or of the fee being in the infeftment. In these circumstances the creditors of the father attached the lands, and the case is put by Lord Mackenzie on these grounds:—His Lordship particularly finds that "the sasine taken on the contract and disposition is so expressed that it cannot have the effect of conveying the fee out of the said Robert Macarthur, or even changing it into a fiduciary fee in his person." A similar decision, and on [1] Jan. 22, 1824, 2 S. 633, and Jan. 20, 1825, 3 S. 317.

No. 149.
June 30, 1876.
Cumstie v. Cumstie's Trustees.

similar grounds, was pronounced in the case of Spalding in 1847.[1] Then the case of Wilson v. Reid, 4th December 1827,[2] was quoted to us. I do not think that it supports the defenders' pleas. The question related to the disposal of the estate of Mrs Wilson. But she, though disponing to herself and her husband in conjunct fee and liferent, for their liferent use allenarly, and to the heirs to be procreated of the marriage, was herself at the date of the marriage the absolute and unlimited fiar, and was so described by Lord Balgray, who rested his opinion specially on that circumstance. There were no children of the marriage, and the decision rested mainly on the fact that her original fee was never taken out of her. The judgment was unanimous, and turned on this specialty. Besides, that deed was to a large extent mortis causa.

The more recent cases of Todd v. Mackenzie,[3] and of Ferguson,[4] do not seem to me to be applicable to the precise point before us. I may be permitted to say that I have no doubt of the soundness of both decisions. But the circumstances here are different, the deeds are different, and the question is different. Either we must here decide that a right, limited and restricted to a liferent, and nothing more, by the force of an unambiguous expression, adopted and used for the purpose of restriction and limitation, and now held to be a vox signata, is nevertheless, and in spite of that restriction, not a right of liferent but a right of substantial and absolute fee, or we must extend one step further the principle of fiduciary fee by applying it to the case of an heir-at-law to whom the fee is disponed by the clear words of the deed.

Between these two alternatives I cannot say that I have not had some little hesitation, for the question is certainly difficult, and I am aware that views differing from mine are held in a quarter which I highly respect; but I have not been sparing of time or labour in studying the question and the authorities, and the result is, that according to the best of my judgment I concur with the Lord Ordinary.

Lord Mure.—I concur in the result of the opinion that has just been delivered, and I have very little to add to what has fallen from Lord Ardmillan with regard to the series of decisions he has referred to as regulating the law as to destinations of this description. The destination in this case is, I think, substantially in terms of the destinations in the early cases of Newlands and of Allardice, which have been referred to. It is a destination first to Mr Cumstie and his wife in liferent, for their liferent use allenarly, and after the death of the longest liver, to and in favour of James Cumstie, Arthur Cumstie, &c., "equally betwixt them in liferent, for their liferent use allenarly, and the respective heirs whomsoever of the said James Cumstie, Arthur Cumstie, and Alexander Cumstie, equally betwixt them in fee, heritably and irredeemably." Now, there is here no express destination to the children of any of these liferenters. But I apprehend that under the words "heirs whatsoever" the children are necessarily included as children to be born; and the question that was put to us very distinctly by Mr Reid in opening was, whether the doctrine laid down in the cases of Newlands and Allardice could be extended to the case where the fee was not taken directly to the heirs of the body, but, as here, to the "heirs whatsoever." Now, the circumstance that a destination was taken to heirs whatsoever must necessarily have been before the Court in disposing of these cases; for in each of them, after the destination to liferenters in their order, there

[1] Houlditch v. Spalding, June 9, 1847, 9 D. 1204. [2] 6 S. 198.
[3] July 18, 1874, ante, vol. i. p. 1203.
[4] Ferguson v. Ferguson, March 19, 1875, ante, vol. ii. p. 627.

No. 149.

June 30, 1876. Cumstie v. Cumstie's Trustees.

was a destination to heirs whatsoever. Yet in looking over the reports of these decisions I do not find that there was any difficulty raised by any of the Judges founded upon the circumstance of that being the ultimate destination. But, with that destination before them, the majority of the Court came to the conclusion that a party holding a conveyance "for his liferent allenarly" was only a fiduciary fiar. So that in these circumstances the question we have here to decide is, whether there is such a difference in the destination in the present case as can warrant us in holding that from the failure of the children of Arthur Cumstie, he was (as is pleaded in the defences) in the position of a party who, in respect of a feudal necessity, had become the fiar of the subjects? That is the first plea in law for the defenders; and there is a second plea in law that he was a fiduciary fiar with a right to nominate the heirs to succeed to the subjects. No authority was referred to in support of that second proposition, as to there being such a right as that of a fiduciary fiar with a right to nominate the heir who is to succeed him; and in the absence of all authority on that point we have simply to consider the question, what was the nature of the right that Arthur Cumstie held? His right is described as that of a liferenter "allenarly." He was fiduciary fiar beyond all question, according to the earlier decisions, for any children who might be born to him. The question then resolves into this, did the non-existence of children at the death of Arthur Cumstie put an end to the fiduciary fee which had been created in him by the terms of the deed, and make the fee absolute in his person,—that is to say, did the fact of his having no children change the nature of his right to that of absolute fiar from that of a liferenter allenarly? Now, I am unable to find any authority for any such transformation of a right. According to the decisions in the cases of Newlands and Allardice, it appears to me to be settled that a party who is described as a liferenter allenarly is a liferenter and nothing more; that he remains a liferenter holding as fiduciary fiar for the heir who may be called on to succeed him at his death, and that in respect of those decisions, as approved of by Judges of the greatest eminence in subsequent cases, a party so situated never has any other right in him but that of a liferenter allenarly with a fiduciary fee. In addition to the opinion of Lord Corehouse, referred to by Lord Ardmillan, I find that in the case of Hutton's Trustees, 11th February 1847, the late Lord Justice-Clerk Hope and the late Lord Moncreiff, in dealing with this matter, mentioned the words "liferent allenarly" as the appropriate and technical term for constituting a liferent, and the right having been so constituted by that appropriate and technical term, I do not think such a liferenter can be held to have had any disposal of the subjects. We had occasion to consider this question not very long ago in the case of Ferguson, referred to by Lord Ardmillan, and also the case of Mrs Maule June 14, 1876, under an entail. In that case the words were "children of the marriage," and there was no specialty. But in Ferguson's case there was a succession of liferenters called, and the difficulty which occurred was whether there might not be some different rule applicable to a case of that sort; but all our difficulties in the case of Ferguson, at least all the difficulties I had, were obviated by an examination of the terms of the conveyance and the opinions of the Judges in the case of Allardice, where there was a succession of liferenters, and where the ultimate destination was to heirs whatsoever. The opinions of the Judges in that case, who had also disposed of the case of Newlands, are not unimportant in dealing with this question. For Lord Eskgrove says—"I remember in Newlands' case it was said that to support such deeds would be to authorise a series of liferents, and to introduce a new way of making an entail. Here we have an instance of it, but you did not think that a sufficient ground for setting aside the deed; you found that according to the principles of our law there must be a fee somewhere, and that the fee in the liferenter must be fiduciary; and I do not see how I can refuse my assent to the rule in that case also. There is no liferent given to any one not named; and although there be a succession of liferenters, yet if you find that there can be one liferenter possessed of this fiduciary right I see no difference betwixt that case and the present." There a liferenter who had no children was held to possess as fiduciary for a succession of liferenters, and with the words "heirs whatsoever" ultimately called; and there is not an observation to the effect that the words "heirs whatsoever" would make any difference in the matter. Lord President Campbell, who was in the minority in the case of Newlands, says,—"This differs from the case of Newlands in this respect, that the question here is with heirs, whereas in that case the question arose amongst creditors. In all questions with heirs or gratuitous claimants the destination must be strictly adhered to, and even had this question occurred with creditors I should have been of the opinion expressed in Newlands' case." I conceive it to be quite settled, therefore, by this series of decisions, that a party situated as Arthur Cumstie was is a liferenter, and nothing more; and I do not think that Arthur Cumstie, consistently with these authorities, can be held to have had any power to settle this right in the way that he has attempted to do.

No. 149.

June 30, 1876. Cumstie v. Cumstie's Trustees.

Lord Deas.—The late William Cumstie, merchant in Oban, and Jean Harriot or Cumstie, his wife, both died in November 1852. They had four sons—James, Arthur, Alexander, and Peter, all of whom survived them. In August 1843 William Cumstie purchased certain subjects in George Street and Argyle Street of Oban, and took the disposition in favour of himself and his wife, "and the longest liver of them two in liferent for their liferent use allenarly, and after the death of the longest liver to and in favour of James Cumstie, merchant in Oban, Arthur Cumstie, merchant there, and Alexander Cumstie, merchant there, equally betwixt them, in liferent for their liferent use allenarly, and the respective heirs whomsoever of the said James Cumstie, Arthur Cumstie, and Alexander Cumstie, equally betwixt them in fee, heritably and irredeemably."

The disposition contained a declaration "that it shall be in the power of the said William Cumstie and Mrs Jean Harriot or Cumstie, and the longest liver of them, at any time of their lives, or of the survivor's life, or even on deathbed, to sell, alienate, and dispone the several subjects and others above described, contract debts thereupon, or even gratuitously to dispose thereof in the same manner and as freely in all respects as if the said several subjects and others had been disponed by these presents absolutely and irredeemably in fee to the said William Cumstie and Mrs Jean Harriot or Cumstie, and the survivor of them."

James, Arthur, and Alexander Cumstie were three of the four sons of William Cumstie and his wife, although they are not so described in the deed. Infeftment followed on the deed, in terms of the above-quoted dispositive clause, in September, and was recorded in October 1843.

On 25th January 1850 William Cumstie, on the narrative of "certain good and onerous causes and considerations," executed a disposition of certain other subjects belonging to him in Argyle Street and Tweeddale Street of Oban, the dispositive clause of which was in these terms:—"I hereby give, grant, alienate, and dispone from me, my heirs and successors, to and in favour of myself and Mrs Jean Harriot or Cumstie, my spouse, and the longest liver of us two, in liferent for our liferent use allenarly, and after the death of the longest liver to and in favour of James Cumstie, merchant in Oban, Arthur Cumstie, merchant there, and Peter Cumstie, merchant there, my sons, equally betwixt them, in liferent for their liferent use allenarly, and the respective heirs whomsoever of the said James Cumstie, Arthur Cumstie, and Peter Cumstie, equally betwixt them in fee, heritably and irredeemably, all and whole," &c.

No. 149.

June 30, 1876.
Cumstie v. Cumstie's Trustees.

In this deed the name of the disponer's son Peter is introduced instead of the name of his son Alexander in the other deed, and the term of entry is declared to be Martinmas 1849. In all other respects the clauses of the two deeds seem to be identical, except that this deed does not contain the clause of reservation above quoted in favour of the spouses and the survivor of them. Infeftment followed on this deed, and was recorded in January 1850.

Upon the death of the spouses in November 1852 the sons entered respectively into possession of the subjects. Arthur died in September 1874, leaving a widow, but no children. He left a trust-disposition and settlement, dated in June 1872, whereby he conveyed his whole heritable and moveable means and estate then belonging "or which shall belong and be addebted to me at the time of my death, or the succession to which after my death I have or may have power to regulate," to the present defenders, as trustees for the purposes therein mentioned, which may be shortly summarised as consisting, 1st, of the regulation of the rights of his wife and their children after his death, if they should have and leave any children; and 2d, a provision that, failing children, his wife, if she survived him (which she has done) should liferent his whole means and estate, subject to payment of debts and legacies (of which last it does not appear that he left any), and that the fee should be divided equally amongst his next of kin and their issue.

Arthur Cumstie's children were, of course, comprehended under the general description of his heirs whomsoever, and if he had left a child or children I do not doubt that it must have been held that a fiduciary fee had vested in him for behoof of such child or children. This, although not expressed, is plainly implied in the deed, and the destination is therefore, I think, to be read as if this had been expressed. It is only just and reasonable so to read the destination in a family deed, intended to regulate the succession of the granter amongst his descendants, which is the nature of both deeds here, although they are in an inter vivos form—the four sons having been, so far as appears, the whole family of the spouses. I therefore read the destination in each of the deeds as running thus, viz., to and in favour of the granter and his wife and longest liver of them in liferent for their liferent use allenarly, and, after the death of the longest liver of them, to and in favour of their three sons named in each deed respectively, equally betwixt them, in liferent for their liferent use allenarly, and the child or children born or to be born of the respective bodies of these sons, whom failing, the respective heirs whomsoever of these sons in fee.

In other words, so far as Arthur Cumstie's share is concerned it is to be held destined, after the death of his father and mother, to Arthur, in liferent for his liferent use allenarly, and the child or children born or to be born of his body, whom failing, to his heirs whomsoever, in fee.

Under such a destination I am of opinion that each of the sons, failing issue of his body (and, consequently, Arthur as one of these sons) became fiar of his equal share of the subjects so conveyed, and might dispose of that share at his pleasure, either by inter vivos or mortis causa deed, subject always to the condition (which the law would imply if not expressed in the deed) that the deed should take effect only failing issue of his own body.

No. 149.

June 30, 1876.
Cumstie v. Cumstie's Trustees.

The issue of Arthur Cumstie, the son, would necessarily have been at the same time the issue of the granter himself, and the deed cannot therefore reasonably be read without implying a fiduciary fee in Arthur, the son, for behoof of such issue, whatever may be said of the effect of the destination beyond. Suppose it had been argued, in opposition to the claim of such issue, that the issue could be in no better position than the heir whomsoever would have been, the answer would, I think, have been conclusive that the issue were entitled to the benefit of the presumption arising from nearness of blood, not only to their immediate parent but to their grandfather, the granter of the deed, by direct descent both from the one and the other, whereas the heir whomsoever might be a collateral, however distant, or possibly the Crown as ultimus hæres. The mere fact that the granter of the deed has comprehended both classes of heirs under one general description of heirs whomsoever could not have excluded the heirs of the body from the benefit of the protection of the fiduciary fee, however clearly it had been made out that no such protection had been extended to collateral or remoter heirs.

But while I thus concede readily that the issue of Arthur's body would have been in the same protected position in which all the cases, from the case of Newlands downwards, have placed issue of the body under a destination to a parent in liferent for his liferent use allenarly, and his child or children, born or to be born, in fee, I desiderate either principle or authority for extending or applying that protection and restriction so as to tie up the parent in a question with his own heir whomsoever.

The case is very different from what it might have been if the destination over (or what in this case may fairly be called the destination over) had been in favour of the heir-male in general, or of any particular class of heirs or persons short of heirs whomsoever, whether described as a class or as individuals. Hitherto, all the cases in which the words "liferent allenarly" have been held to create a fiduciary fee, when otherwise the fee would have been absolute, have been cases of parents and children, and I do not choose to speculate unnecessarily as to how far the same principle might be held to sanction or create a fiduciary fee for the benefit of a specified class of heirs or persons, or for the benefit of one of such specified class of heirs or persons, although not an heir or heirs of the body. For the purposes of this case I shall assume, in the fullest manner, that in all such cases there would be a fiduciary fee for behoof of the person or persons, or heir or heirs, for whom the granter had thus shewn his predilection; still, I remain of opinion that there can be no fiduciary fee beyond such personæ prædilectæ for behoof of the heir whomsoever.

It would be quite a fallacious mode of reasoning to say that you first find it fixed by the words "liferent allenarly" that the nominatim disponee is a liferenter merely, and then you go on to inquire who is the fiar. That would be against all feudal principle and against the rule followed in all the decisions in this class of cases. It is true that a conveyance in liferent allenarly, if no other words had followed, would have given Arthur Cumstie nothing but a bare liferent; but that would have been because the fee would have remained in hæreditate jacente of his father, the granter of the deeds. The case becomes very different where the granter, as here, has parted out and out with the fee after the death of himself and his wife, and has added to the liferent a conveyance of the fee to the heirs whomsoever of Arthur Cumstie, the so-called liferenter. You must consider both questions—the liferent and the fee—before you can determine either of them. If there be any difference in the order in which the two things ought to be considered the law would rather give the preference to the question of fee; for the feudal law imperatively demands a fiar, but does not at all demand a liferenter. The true view, however, is, that the one question cannot be solved without considering the other. What would be a bare liferent may be, and indeed in this class of cases must be, a fee, if there be no other fiar.

No. 149.
June 30, 1876.
Cumstie v. Cumstie's Trustees.

Here the intermediate destination to Arthur Cumstie's issue, which was conditional upon their coming into existence, has failed entirely by his having no issue. The word "allenarly" was necessary to protect and preserve the fee for his issue if they had come into existence. If that word had not been used Arthur Cumstie would have been absolute fiar in a question with his own issue. The word may, therefore, fairly be held to have served its purpose, without supposing that it was meant for a purpose never before attempted in any recorded instance, unless indeed in entails, and then attempted unsuccessfully. If this view were not of itself satisfactory or sufficient, the observation would remain, that as the last words used (viz., the destination to his heirs whomsoever) naturally imply a fee in the person of Arthur Cumstie, these must overrule and negative the effect of the prior words, which, if taken by themselves, might have limited his right to a liferent merely.

As Lord Brougham observed in the case of Gordon v. M'Intosh, H. L., April 17, 1845, 4 Bell's Ap. pp. 121, 122, and 3 Ross, p. 626, the word "allenarly" may be defeated in its operation by other words in the deed.

Of this we have an instance in the case of Reid or Wilson v. Reid, &c., Dec. 4, 1827, 6 S. and D., N. E. 198, and F. C. The conveyance by Margaret Reid was to herself and her husband "in conjunct fee and liferent, for our liferent use allenarly, and to the heirs to be procreated betwixt us, the said spouses, whom failing," one-half to her own heirs and one-half to her husband's heirs; and this conveyance bore to be in consideration of a conveyance by the husband's father of a different subject containing a precisely similar destination. After the marriage had subsisted for twenty-seven years, and the prospect of issue was considered hopeless, and the husband, although still alive, was in bankrupt circumstances, the wife brought an action against the heirs-presumptive both of herself and her husband, concluding, inter alia, to have it found and declared that "the pursuer has the only good and undoubted title, not only to the liferent, but also to the fee of the subjects belonging to her and conveyed as aforesaid."

The Lord Ordinary (Newton) found "that, on the principle of the case of Newlands, and the later cases founded on by the defenders, the right of the pursuer was, by her disposition of 14th May 1807, reduced to a liferent; at least, that if the fee remained in her person or that of her husband, it was a fiduciary fee for behoof of the chilren of the marriage, and, failing them, of the pursuer's heirs quoad the one-half, and of her husband's heirs quoad the other," and therefore assoilzied from the declaratory conclusions of the libel. But Mr Shaw's report bears—"The pursuer having reclaimed, the Court called on the counsel for the defenders to support the interlocutor, and, without hearing the counsel for the pursuer, unanimously altered"—the Lord President (Hope) observing, "it is quite impossible that the interlocutor can stand." The judgment, as the Faculty Report shews, decerned and declared in terms, inter alia, of the declaratory conclusion of the libel.

No. 149.

June 30, 1876. Cumstie v. Cumstie's Trustees.

It is true that in that case it was an important fact that the subject had originally flowed from the wife, and that accounts for the fee being found to be in her and not in the husband. But it will be distinctly understood that I am not citing the case as a precedent in the present case (for direct precedent I know of none, either the one way or the other), but as an illustration of the principle that the use of the words "liferent allenarly" is not conclusive of the right being a bare liferent, but that we must look beyond, and in the present case must consider carefully the effect of the destination which follows in favour of Arthur Cumstie's heirs whomsoever before we can affirm that he is a liferenter merely. It is not immaterial, however, as bearing upon the present case, to observe the ground on which Lord Balgray (no inconsiderable feudalist) placed his judgment in Reid's case, as reported in the Faculty Collection. After observing that the deed was both inter vivos and mortis causa, and therefore that it was important to attend to the previous rights of the parties—that is, of the husband and wife respectively—his Lordship said—"So far as regards the heirs of the marriage the deed was onerous; but whenever the parties came to consider their heirs whatsoever it was a deed merely mortis causa, to which their heirs could not make up titles without serving heirs; and therefore (his Lordship thought) that the fee of the subjects still remained with the pursuer."

It is not, however, upon any supposed repugnance between the restrictive words "liferent allenarly" and the destination which follows in favour of Arthur Cumstie's heirs whomsoever that I rest my opinion in the present case. On the contrary, I think the two expressions are in this deed quite consistent, being applicable to two different contingencies,—the one, that of Arthur Cumstie having a child or children,—and the other of his having none. The first of the two deeds was unskilfully framed in not expressing this more fully, and the conveyancer in the second deed obviously followed the model of the first. But the meaning shines out clearly enough. It is easy to understand that the granter should intend the fee to go to his own grandchildren subject to their father's liferent, so that they, as well as their father, might be reasonably provided for; but it is not easy to understand that the granter should intend to prefer his son's heir whomsoever, however remote, to his son himself, to exclude his son's widow, if he left a widow (as he happens to have done) from the benefit of her terce or of any provision her husband might wish to make for her failing their having issue, and likewise to exclude the son, if he resolved to live and die a bachelor or a widower, from all power to dispose of the estate conditional on his having no issue, in order to preserve it for some unknown heir whomsoever, who was not himself to be under any limitation, and might possibly be the Crown as ultimus hæres. I think that would be an irrational construction of the deed, or at least a construction in support of which we are not justified in applying, for the first time in the history of our law, the fiction of a fiduciary fee.

The use of the words "liferent allenarly" in the deed is, as I have said, quite sufficiently accounted for without putting upon the deed any such improbable construction. Arthur Cumstie might have had issue. Without the word "allenarly" his liferent would have been a fee, absolute and unlimited, in a question with his own issue. It was, therefore, necessary that the word should be used; but the purpose of using it is fully satisfied without supposing that, besides the protection of the issue, it was meant to serve a purpose to which it had never hitherto been held applicable, and which, if really entertained, should have been made the subject of an ordinary trust-deed, in which the granter could have expressed his purpose in plain and intelligible language, and without the risk of being misunderstood.

The cabalistic word "allenarly" is no such favourite in the law of conveyancing as to entitle it to receive effect in a case like the present, contrary to all the presumptions of intention on the part of the granter arising from the law of nature as between parent and child. Prior to the case of Newlands it had been immemorially the established law of Scotland that a conveyance to an individual in liferent and his issue, born or to be born, in fee, where nothing more appeared, gave the fee to the parent. This is still the undoubted law of Scotland. It might have been better that this had never been so, but the general law could not be gone back upon at the date of the case of Newlands without unsettling the titles to many valuable estates, and what the Court did in that case was to sanction an exception to the general law, of the occasional hardship of which the case before them, where the estate was being carried off by the father's creditors, presented a strong instance, although, as a general rule, the hardship is really not so great as it seems, for all that has to be done is, in place of resorting to the fiction, to execute a trust-deed for behoof of the disponee in liferent, and his issue born or to be born in fee, which effectually secures the fee to the children, although neither the word "allenarly" nor any corresponding word or expression occurs in the deed, as is well known to every conveyancer, and was long ago decided in the case of Seton v. Seton's Creditors, March 6, 1793, M. 4219. If the granter prefers it, I know nothing to prevent the father himself from being named as the trustee, and infeft under an appropriate precept of sasine in that express character.

It was with great hesitation and difficulty that the judgment in the case of Newlands was affirmed in the House of Lords. But the hesitation arose, not from any idea that the general law could or ought to be gone back upon, but from the more than doubtful expediency of sanctioning an exception to that law, so long settled and so well understood, that the rule had come to express the intention. The Lord Chancellor Loughborough (afterwards Lord Rosslyn) observed—"These propositions have been agreed on in the argument which has been maintained: If a conveyance is granted to a person in liferent, and thereafter to the heirs of his body in fee, then such person must of necessity be fiar. It is also an agreed principle, recognised in the law of Scotland, that a fee cannot be in pendente;" but if the word "allenarly" was added to liferent, it was then contended that the fee was to be somewhere—his Lordship said he could not tell where. "This distinction," he proceeded to say, "which the counsel admitted could not be maintained in reasoning or in principle, does not add one distinct idea to the limitation;" but as he had been assured that the exception had been very generally understood and acted on, and as "the judgment gives effect to the intention of the testator, which in equity ought always to be supported, as far as can be done consistently with the rules of law, and though I feel no conviction, though my mind inclines to doubt exceedingly that the judgment proceeded on safe grounds, yet I have not courage to venture on a reversal." —(M. 4294-5.)

No. 149.
June 30, 1876.
Cumstie v. Cumstie's Trustees.

In like manner Lord Eldon, in the case of Dewar v. M'Kinnon,[1] speaking of the ordinary rule that a conveyance in liferent to a parent and the issue, born or to born, in fee, gives the fee to the parent, says—"My Lords, in respect to the doctrine itself, I should take it to be clearly established (and whether right or wrong it is not of much consequence to inquire when the point is clearly established) that if there is a limitation in a conveyance of an interest in præsenti, and unconnected with any question of contract, to a man and his wife and the children of the marriage, on feudal principles the fee is in the parents—one of the parents is the fiar—which of the parents depends upon the circumstances—and it is impossible, in my view of the case, to read what fell from my Lord Rosslyn in the case of Newlands without seeing that it was his notion that, after that doctrine was once clearly established, it would have been infinitely better to have adhered to that doctrine than to deny the application of that doctrine because the word 'allenarly' was used." Lord Eldon added—"I am ready to go this length, namely, to say that as this House was advised by my Lord Rosslyn that the effect that was originally attributed to the word 'allenarly' ought in his judgment still to be attributed to it, so it ought to have that effect; at the same time I apprehend your Lordships will take great care not to extend the effect of that word farther, unless you are convinced that you ought to extend it farther."

The observation of Lord Brougham in Gordon v. M'Intosh, concurring with an observation of Lord Corehouse, to the effect that the feudal maxim might have been saved by supposing a fiduciary fee in the parent, equally whether the word "allenarly" was used or not, and expressing regret that it had not been so settled, cannot be regarded as conflicting with the observations of Lord Rosslyn and Lord Eldon in reference to the case of Newlands, but as referring to what might have been done at some period greatly more remote, when alone the general law could have been settled differently from what it had immemorially been. At the date of the judgment in the case of Newlands, while there was said to have been practice in support of the exception, it had become just as impracticable to go back upon the general law as it would be in the present day.

But it is one thing to sanction, as was done in the case of Newlands, an exception to the general law, in order to give effect to the predilection which the granter of the deed had intensified by the use of the word "allenarly" in favour of his son's issue, who were his own descendants, and quite another thing to sanction such an exception in a case like the present, where by the law of nature all the predilection is in favour of the son, and where, at the same time, by the law of the land, the son's heir whatsoever is not within the recognised category of personæ prædilectæ at all.

It has been suggested by my brother Lord Mure that the case of Allardice, 5th March 1795 (fully reported in Bell's Folio Cases, p. 156, and noticed briefly, and therefore imperfectly, by Mr Ross, vol. iii. 655), is more favourable for the heir whatsoever than the case of Newlands. I have been familiar with both these cases for more than half a century. I have renewed my study of them on the present occasion, and I own I am utterly unable to discover in the difference of details in the case of Allardice any difference in principle which can make it an authority in this case for the heir whatsoever any more than the case of Newlands and the other cases of that class, all of which leave the present case untouched either one way or the other, except in so far as they stand in contrast to it.

[1] May 5, 1825, 1 W. and S. vol. i., and Ross, L. C., 3 L. R. 607.

The granter of the deed in the case of Allardice was understood to have been displeased with the then subsisting marriage of his eldest son Robert, of which there was a daughter, Jean, alive at the date of the deed. Consequently he destined his estate of Memus to Robert in liferent allenarly, and to the heirs of Robert's body by any future marriage he might enter into, which failing, to the granter's second son David in liferent allenarly and the heirs of his body in fee, which failing, to the granter's own nearest heirs or assignees whatsoever in fee.

Robert survived the granter, and accepted of the deed by taking infeftment upon it, and exercising a power conferred upon him to burden the estate with £200, and, indeed, as was observed on the bench, he had no power to have repudiated the deed. Afterwards, however, he obtained a precept of clare constat, and took infeftment thereon as his father's heir-at-law. Acting on this fee-simple title, he executed a disposition altering the destination in his father's deed so far as to substitute his own daughter Jean, nominatim, immediately after the heirs of any marriage he might subsequently enter into, and before his brother David, the nominatim substitute in the fiduciary fee, and the heirs of David's body.

David Allardice and his son, for whom he was the substituted fiduciary fiar, brought a reduction of Robert's deed, coupled with a declarator; and what the Court decided was that this deed was ultra vires of Robert, and could not affect the succession—a judgment in which I should have entirely concurred.

There was some alarm expressed among the Judges—particularly by Lord President Campbell—as to whether they had not, by their decision in Newlands' case, introduced a principle which would sanction a new kind of entail by a succession of liferents allenarly. It is unnecessary here to go into that speculation; but I may observe, in passing, that I think the President pretty well solved his own difficulty when he said—"Had Robert, the son, been succeeded by heirs of his own body of a subsequent marriage, I have some notion that the substitutions would have been at an end." He afterwards referred to Brown v. Coventry, Bell's 8vo Cases, p. 310, where this principle was applied in the case of a legacy, and said—"It is in some respects different, to be sure, but I should retain my opinion even in the case of a land estate."

The only doubt in the case of Allardice was that suggested by Lord Eskgrove, whether the fiduciary fee could be held by Robert not only for his own future issue, if he should marry and have any, but for his brother and his brother's children. This was not very accurately expressed by his Lordship, for it did not require a fiduciary fee in Robert to sanction the substitution or succession of David as a nominatim liferenter, whether allenarly or not; and none of the other Judges took any notice of this supposed difficulty. They thought it enough that the question was amongst heirs, and that the obvious intention of the granter of the deed, that David should be both liferenter and fiduciary fiar failing the existence of any objects for whom Robert could be fiduciary fiar, must therefore receive effect. Thus Lord Justice-Clerk Macqueen said—"I own I did not see a question in this case. The only difference betwixt it and Newlands is that there is here a succession of liferenters; but there is nothing in that." He then distinguishes the position of Robert, the son, from that of a stranger, and says—"There is nothing more clear than that an heir is bound by the settlements of his predecessor." That appears to me to be perfectly sound doctrine, and, indeed, I have no occasion for the purposes of the present case to impugn anything whatever affirmed in the case of Allardice.

No. 149.
June 30, 1876.
Cumstie v. Cumstie's Trustees.

My brother Lord Mure has farther said, and made it, I think, the keystone of his opinion, that in the cases of Newlands and of Allardice the Judges must have seen that there was a destination to heirs whomsoever failing heirs of the body, and yet that this fact did not influence the opinions which they formed, that the fee was fiduciary only. Now, in the first place, his Lordship has overlooked the fact that in both of these cases the destination, failing heirs of the body, was not to the heirs whomsoever of the fiduciary fiar, but to the heirs whomsoever of the granter of the deed. And, in the next place, he has overlooked the fact that in both of these cases, and indeed in all the cases of this class which have been decided, issue of the body existed, so that there was no room for raising any question as to what would have been the result if such issue had not existed, and the question had been either with the disponees of the fiduciary fiar or with his heirs whomsoever, or with the heirs whomsoever of the granter of the deed.

I do not, of course, mean to represent either the case of Newlands or the case of Allardice, or any of the other cases of that class, as authorities for my opinion in this case. But I may confidently affirm that none of them are authorities to the contrary. All of the cases related to the rights of the issue for whom the fiduciary fee was held, and none of them either raised or could have raised such a question as occurs in this case, where there is no issue, either in esse or in posse, to compete with the disponees of the deceased fiduciary fiar, and the party claiming is in the eye of the law eadem persona cum defuncto, to or through whom he must make up a title inferring that he represents him universally in his debts and deeds. The proposal to apply the exceptional doctrine of fiduciary fee to the case of that party by the use of the word "allenarly" brings up, in the most forcible of all ways, the caution given by Lord Eldon—"I apprehend your Lordships will take great care not to extend the effect of that word farther unless you are convinced that you ought to extend it farther."

I cannot but think it a startling extension of the effect of the word "allenarly" to attempt by means of it to bring within the category of personæ prædilectæ the heirs whomsoever of the granter's son, in competition with the son himself. Even in a deed of strict entail heirs whatsoever are never regarded as personæ prædilectæ; and it would be strange if they were to be so regarded in such a case as this of fiduciary fee. In Mackintosh v. Gordon (4 Bell's App. 120, and 3 Ross, 624) Lord Campbell said that "if the word 'allenarly' is added, this is tantamount to fencing clauses in a deed of entail, and prevents alienation, though still the parent would be fiar." But his Lordship did not suggest that the word "allenarly" was stronger than the fencing clauses of a strict entail. The case of Macgregor v. Gordon, December 1, 1864, 3 Macph. 148, settles the question which the case of Macalpine Leny had barely left open, that although heirs-portioners be expressly excluded by the deed of entail, the destination in favour of A B and his heirs whomsoever makes A B at once fee-simple proprietor. In that case it was the clear intention of the granter to fetter A B as in a question with A B's heir whomsoever, whereas in the present case there is not even probability in favour of such an intention. We could hardly have a stronger proof than this case of Macgregor v. Gordon that heirs whomsoever are not within the category of personæ prædilectæ by our law and practice, and it is for that alone that I here refer to it.

No. 149.
June 30, 1876.
Cumstie v. Cumstie's Trustees.

I may observe, in passing, that the late case of Todd v. Mackenzie, although too peculiar a case to allow of the judgment being directly applicable to any other, contains some suggestive matter, very proper to be considered in connection with this case. For instance, I agree with the observation of your Lordship in the chair in that case, that "a man's heir has no existence until he dies, and it never can be ascertained until he dies who is to be his heir." I farther agree with your Lordship, as I observe I stated at the time, that there was in that case no destination, in the event of Mr Todd surviving his daughter, to the person who should then be nearest in blood to Mr Todd. That might possibly have been regarded as a destination to a persona prædilecta, as distinguished from a destination to heirs whomsoever, a distinction to which we gave effect in the late case of Ferguson v. Ferguson's Trustees, March 19, 1875, 2 Rettie, 627.

The case of Jamieson, March 2, 1775, M. 4284, referred to in the case of Reid, which I have cited above, if it cannot be called a precedent in the present case, is at least highly instructive with reference to the question whether the fee given to the heirs whomsoever of Arthur Cumstie was or was not, in the event which has happened, given to himself. By the contract of marriage between Rachel Wilson and her first husband David Russel, her father assigned to her husband the sum of 5000 merks, which was accepted in full of all her legal claims. It was, however, conditioned in the contract that "in case there be no child alive at the time of the said Rachel Wilson her death, then there shall 1000 merks of her tocher return to her nearest heirs and executors. The marriage was dissolved by the death of David Russel without issue. Rachel Wilson, by a postnuptial contract with her second husband Andrew Jamieson, assigned to him the 1000 merks, and after her death Jamieson conveyed this sum and his other estate to a trustee for his creditors. In a multiplepoinding the above sum of 1000 merks was claimed, on the one hand, by the executors and nearest in kin of Rachel Wilson, and, on the other hand, by her second husband, Jamieson, as her assignee, and the trustee to whom he had conveyed his estates for behoof of his creditors. The report bears—"The Lord Ordinary gave a judgment preferring Jamieson, the husband, to the wife's next of kin, who reclaimed," and pleaded, that after Rachael Wilson's marriage to David Russel the fee of the whole tocher was in him, and as to the 1000 merks, part of that tocher, "the right never could be in Rachel, because the condition on which the sum was to return being her death without children it could not be purified during her life. Upon the death of Russel both the liferent and fee of this sum devolved upon his heir, burdened with the return thereof, at the death of Rachel Wilson, to her nearest heirs and executors, so that at no period whatever had Rachel either the liferent or the fee of this money."

To this it was answered—"By the words of the contract itself the fee of the 1000 merks must have been vested in Rachel Wilson, upon this ground, that where a sum of money is taken to a person's heirs and executors, such sum will undoubtedly belong to the person himself, and be at his disposal, unless it shall evidently appear that the designation of heirs and executors was intended to demonstrate and point out certain individuals intended to be favoured. The right to the 1000 merks must have been in somebody after the dissolution of marriage between Rachel Wilson and her husband by his death. It could not be in the husband's heirs, who had not right thereto by the contract. It could not be in the executors of Rachel, because till her death no such persons did exist. It must therefore have immediately vested in her own person, and become assignable at will. It is therefore evident that in the eye of law a right granted to the heirs and executors of any person is virtually granted to the person himself, and of consequence, that the 1000 merks in question were as much provided to return to Rachel Wilson as if she herself had been expressly mentioned in the clause of return."

No. 149. June 30, 1876. Cumstie v. Cumstie's Trustees.

It is obvious, I think, from the report that the Court, in adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, adopted this reasoning, which I conceive to be sound in itself, and equally applicable to the present case as it was to the case of Jamieson. I need not say that it makes no difference in such questions whether the subject in dispute be heritable or moveable. (Vide observations as to the application of feudal principles equally to money and land, per Lords Brougham and Campbell in Gordon's case, already referred to).

My brother, Lord Ardmillan, has observed that the creditors of Arthur Cumstie could not have attached the fee of the subjects in Arthur Cumstie's lifetime, and unless they could have done so his Lordship concludes that there could have been no fee in Arthur Cumstie which could be carried by his mortis causa deed. But that conclusion does not follow at all. The creditors of Arthur Cumstie could not attach and sell the subjects in his lifetime, because Arthur Cumstie might have left issue; and it was on this principle that the subjects were struck out of the ranking and sale in the case of Newlands. But the creditors of Arthur Cumstie might have been entitled to inhibit him from disposing of the fee to their prejudice if, by the failure of issue, it should happen to come to him, and, in any view, they could not be excluded from vindicating their preference over his mortis causa disponees. This accordingly has not been attempted by Arthur Cumstie's trust-disposition and settlement, the leading purpose of which is for payment of all his just and lawful debts.

I need hardly say that if the destination to the heirs whomsoever of Arthur Cumstie, failing heirs of his body, was virtually a destination to himself failing heirs of his body, there is nothing either subtle or anomalous in holding that he might dispose of the subjects by mortis causa deed, subject to the implied condition that he should die childless. He was in this view substituted conditionally to the heirs of his own body, and, as the event shews, that the condition was purified, I am humbly of opinion that his trust-deed and settlement ought to receive effect. I am therefore for altering the interlocutor reclaimed against, and I shall greatly regret, for the sake of our general law of conveyancing (hitherto clear and consistent in this department), if your Lordships shall affirm a different result.

Lord President.—After the very full opinions which have been given on both sides of this question I shall endeavour to confine my observations within a reasonable limit. But the question is one undoubtedly of great importance, and involving principles of law, and considerations even of expediency and utility, which make the case more than usually interesting. The deeds here it is unnecessary to examine at any length, because I quite agree with my brother Lord Deas that the question really is, whether a conveyance to Arthur Cumstie in liferent for his liferent use allenarly and his heirs whomsoever in fee vests a right of fee in Arthur Cumstie. I am not sure that I can concur in holding

No. 149.

June 30, 1876. Cumstie v. Cumstie's Trustees.

that this is exactly the same thing as if the conveyance had been to Arthur Cumstie in liferent for his liferent use allenarly and to the issue of his body, whom failing, his heirs whomsoever, in fee. That introduces other considerations, to which, perhaps, I may advert hereafter; but I take the words as I find them, and dealing with this as a liferent in Arthur Cumstie, restricted by the use of the word "allenarly," with a fee given to his heirs whomsoever directly, I think if Arthur Cumstie had had children, his eldest son must have succeeded under this deed as his heir whomsoever, and not as the heir-male of his body. That it is a mere right of succession in substance, I think, nobody can very well doubt, because these were testamentary arrangements that were made by Mr William Cumstie, the father of Arthur, providing a right to his son which appears to me to be a right of bare liferent, and providing also where the estate should go after the death of that son. That the law of Scotland sometimes holds what is ex figura verborum a liferent to be in legal effect a fee nobody can dispute; but I apprehend that that has never been done except in two classes of cases. The first is where the words of the deed itself make it perfectly clear that it was the intention of the maker of the deed that the liferenter should be fiar. Of that the most familiar and obvious example is where an estate is conveyed to a person in liferent and to another in fee, but giving to the liferenter a power of disposal at pleasure. The liferenter there has the whole attributes of an absolute proprietor. He has the beneficial enjoyment of the estate, and he has the absolute power of disposal. There the law holds the liferenter to be fiar, out of deference to the plain intention of the maker of the deed. The other class of cases is that which is represented by the judgment in Frog's Creditors. Now, that is an extremely important case, and it fixes undoubtedly that where the words used are simply to A in liferent and to his children nascituri in fee, or the heirs of his body in fee, or the issue of a marriage in fee, there the parent is the fiar. That authority, and the principle upon which it proceeds, has never been extended to any case except the case of parent and child, and it has never been extended to any case except where the conveyance is in these terms—to the parent in liferent and to the children nascituri in fee. It was perhaps a strong thing to hold that because the fiar was non-existent it must therefore have been the intention of the maker of the deed that the liferenter should be fiar. But the necessity of complying with what was supposed to be a rule of the feudal law induced the Court to fix that, and to settle it in such a way that the rule has never been and never can be now disturbed. That it was done with regret at the time, and that it has been regretted ever since, I think, is abundantly clear. Some of your Lordships have referred to expressions of regret upon that subject by Judges in modern times; but it is not immaterial to observe that we have the recorded testimony of Lord Kilkerran that the very Judges who decided the case of Frog's Creditors did it with reluctance. He says in the case of Lillie v. Riddell[1]—a case precisely of the same description, which occurred in 1741—"The point was formerly so determined in the case of the children of Robert Frog against his creditors, No. 55, and only because the Court had given different judgments upon it in that case is the present case taken notice of, in which it was so much considered as an established point that a bill reclaiming against the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor was rejected without answer, many of the Court at the same time declaring, as likewise had been done in the said case of Frog, that but for

[1] M. 4267.

No. 149.
June 30, 1876.
Cumstie v. Cumstie's Trustees.

be in the husband's heirs, who had not right thereto by the contract. It could not be in the executors of Rachel, because till her death no such persons did exist. It must therefore have immediately vested in her own person, and become assignable at will. It is therefore evident that in the eye of law a right granted to the heirs and executors of any person is virtually granted to the person himself, and of consequence, that the 1000 merks in question were as much provided to return to Rachel Wilson as if she herself had been expressly mentioned in the clause of return."

It is obvious, I think, from the report that the Court, in adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, adopted this reasoning, which I conceive to be sound in itself, and equally applicable to the present case as it was to the case of Jamieson. I need not say that it makes no difference in such questions whether the subject in dispute be heritable or moveable. (Vide observations as to the application of feudal principles equally to money and land, per Lords Brougham and Campbell in Gordon's case, already referred to).

My brother, Lord Ardmillan, has observed that the creditors of Arthur Cumstie could not have attached the fee of the subjects in Arthur Cumstie's lifetime, and unless they could have done so his Lordship concludes that there could have been no fee in Arthur Cumstie which could be carried by his mortis causa deed. But that conclusion does not follow at all. The creditors of Arthur Cumstie could not attach and sell the subjects in his lifetime, because Arthur Cumstie might have left issue; and it was on this principle that the subjects were struck out of the ranking and sale in the case of Newlands. But the creditors of Arthur Cumstie might have been entitled to inhibit him from disposing of the fee to their prejudice if, by the failure of issue, it should happen to come to him, and, in any view, they could not be excluded from vindicating their preference over his mortis causa disponees. This accordingly has not been attempted by Arthur Cumstie's trust-disposition and settlement, the leading purpose of which is for payment of all his just and lawful debts.

I need hardly say that if the destination to the heirs whomsoever of Arthur Cumstie, failing heirs of his body, was virtually a destination to himself failing heirs of his body, there is nothing either subtle or anomalous in holding that he might dispose of the subjects by mortis causa deed, subject to the implied condition that he should die childless. He was in this view substituted conditionally to the heirs of his own body, and, as the event shews, that the condition was purified, I am humbly of opinion that his trust-deed and settlement ought to receive effect. I am therefore for altering the interlocutor reclaimed against, and I shall greatly regret, for the sake of our general law of conveyancing (hitherto clear and consistent in this department), if your Lordships shall affirm a different result.

Lord President.—After the very full opinions which have been given on both sides of this question I shall endeavour to confine my observations within a reasonable limit. But the question is one undoubtedly of great importance, and involving principles of law, and considerations even of expediency and utility, which make the case more than usually interesting. The deeds here it is unnecessary to examine at any length, because I quite agree with my brother Lord Deas that the question really is, whether a conveyance to Arthur Cumstie in liferent for his liferent use allenarly and his heirs whomsoever in fee vests a right of fee in Arthur Cumstie. I am not sure that I can concur in holding

No. 149.

June 30, 1876. Cumstie v. Cumstie's Trustees.

that this is exactly the same thing as if the conveyance had been to Arthur Cumstie in liferent for his liferent use allenarly and to the issue of his body, whom failing, his heirs whomsoever, in fee. That introduces other considerations, to which, perhaps, I may advert hereafter; but I take the words as I find them, and dealing with this as a liferent in Arthur Cumstie, restricted by the use of the word "allenarly," with a fee given to his heirs whomsoever directly, I think if Arthur Cumstie had had children, his eldest son must have succeeded under this deed as his heir whomsoever, and not as the heir-male of his body. That it is a mere right of succession in substance, I think, nobody can very well doubt, because these were testamentary arrangements that were made by Mr William Cumstie, the father of Arthur, providing a right to his son which appears to me to be a right of bare liferent, and providing also where the estate should go after the death of that son. That the law of Scotland sometimes holds what is ex figura verborum a liferent to be in legal effect a fee nobody can dispute; but I apprehend that that has never been done except in two classes of cases. The first is where the words of the deed itself make it perfectly clear that it was the intention of the maker of the deed that the liferenter should be fiar. Of that the most familiar and obvious example is where an estate is conveyed to a person in liferent and to another in fee, but giving to the liferenter a power of disposal at pleasure. The liferenter there has the whole attributes of an absolute proprietor. He has the beneficial enjoyment of the estate, and he has the absolute power of disposal. There the law holds the liferenter to be fiar, out of deference to the plain intention of the maker of the deed. The other class of cases is that which is represented by the judgment in Frog's Creditors. Now, that is an extremely important case, and it fixes undoubtedly that where the words used are simply to A in liferent and to his children nascituri in fee, or the heirs of his body in fee, or the issue of a marriage in fee, there the parent is the fiar. That authority, and the principle upon which it proceeds, has never been extended to any case except the case of parent and child, and it has never been extended to any case except where the conveyance is in these terms—to the parent in liferent and to the children nascituri in fee. It was perhaps a strong thing to hold that because the fiar was non-existent it must therefore have been the intention of the maker of the deed that the liferenter should be fiar. But the necessity of complying with what was supposed to be a rule of the feudal law induced the Court to fix that, and to settle it in such a way that the rule has never been and never can be now disturbed. That it was done with regret at the time, and that it has been regretted ever since, I think, is abundantly clear. Some of your Lordships have referred to expressions of regret upon that subject by Judges in modern times; but it is not immaterial to observe that we have the recorded testimony of Lord Kilkerran that the very Judges who decided the case of Frog's Creditors did it with reluctance. He says in the case of Lillie v. Riddell[1]—a case precisely of the same description, which occurred in 1741—"The point was formerly so determined in the case of the children of Robert Frog against his creditors, No. 55, and only because the Court had given different judgments upon it in that case is the present case taken notice of, in which it was so much considered as an established point that a bill reclaiming against the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor was rejected without answer, many of the Court at the same time declaring, as likewise had been done in the said case of Frog, that but for

[1] M. 4267.

No. 149.

June 30, 1876. Cumstie v. Cumstie's Trustees.

the course of decisions they should have been of opinion that the son was not fiar but fiduciary for his children." That case of Lillie v. Riddell occurred just six years after the case of Frog's Creditors, and Lord Kilkerran, who was then upon the bench, must have been intimately acquainted with the sentiments of the Judges who decided both cases. Now, it appears to me that a rule so fixed is not to be extended. It is a rule which was settled in deference to a feudal difficulty, but that feudal difficulty, it has been more than once suggested, might have been got rid of afterwards without violating the apparent intention of the maker of the deed by the invention of that other subtlety, viz., a fiduciary fee, which after all had to be invented to prevent the farther progress of this unfortunate doctrine. The rule, if it had been absolutely applied, and if it had been understood as it was in Frog's Creditors that the only way of preventing a fee being in pendente when an estate was given to the parent in liferent and to his children in fee was to hold the fee to be in the liferenter,—if that had been carried out to its full consequences it would not have in the least mattered how plainly the maker of the deed had expressed his intention that the man he called a liferenter was intended to be a liferenter merely, because the feudal difficulty would still have remained. But it very soon became apparent, and in the case of Newlands more particularly, that the Court were not disposed to carry out the doctrine of Frog's case to its logical consequences, but, on the contrary, felt the necessity of stopping in that course. And accordingly the rule of Frog's Creditors received a very severe check, I think, in the case of Newlands, and all the class of cases to which it belongs; and there the rule remains to this day. It is applicable to a case of parent and child, and it is applicable to a case where no more is said than that the conveyance is made to the parent in liferent and to the children nascituri in fee; but it is not applicable to any other case whatever; and I, for one, am not prepared to carry that doctrine any farther. I am prepared to hold that when a testator says that he intends a person to hold a liferent, and nothing but a liferent, which is what is signified by the use of the words "liferent allenarly" or "liferent use allenarly," it is not the rule of law that that liferent shall under any circumstances be extended farther. My brother Lord Deas says that it is not the custom of the Court, and it would be inconsistent with feudal principle, to consider what is the intention of the maker of a deed in regard to the liferenter without considering at the same time what is to become of the fee, and I am quite sensible of the importance of that observation. But what I mean is this, that I will not construe the intention of the maker of the deed in regard to the fee in any sense inconsistent with his plainly expressed intention as to the nature of the liferent. For example, in the present case, if I could concur with my brother Lord Deas in holding that the conveyance of the fee here to the heirs whatsoever of Arthur Cumstie is not a good conveyance of the fee to them—as is the substance and result of his opinion—I should then seek for a solution of the difficulty, not by holding the liferenter to be fiar in contradiction to the expressed intention of the maker of the deed, but by holding that the fee was not disposed of at all; for that a liferent may be created without disposing of the fee at all, or that a liferent may be created while an ineffectual attempt is made to dispose of the fee, I suppose is quite a legal possibility. And therefore, if the fee is not well given in this case to the heirs whatsoever of Arthur Cumstie, then, in my humble opinion, it would remain with the granter—(I am not speaking now of the form of these particular deeds, but of the simple case which I supposed at the outset)—and in the event of his death it would be in his hæreditas jacens. Now, is it matter of doubt upon the face of this deed that when the truster said that he desired Arthur Cumstie to have a liferent for his liferent use allenarly he intended these words to convey the meaning which they have always been understood to convey for nearly a century? I cannot see any reason to doubt it. I cannot see the slightest reason to doubt that he had an entra voluntas that Arthur Cumstie should not be fiar of this estate; and I cannot see any reason for not giving effect to his intention. I think it must be conceded that the use of the word "allenarly" in connection with the liferent has always been held to have the effect of restricting to a bare liferent, as it is called, that is to say, preventing the possibility of its being construed to be a fee. The cases which have been noticed, apparently bearing somewhat to the opposite result, are all very easily explained. The case of Falconer v. Wright,[1] referred to by my brother Lord Ardmillan, is obviously a case where the fee was held to be in the party who, under the marriage-contract, had a liferent allenarly because of his pre-existing infeftment which was not discharged, and which made him absolute proprietor of the estate, and the Court said that the case was different from that of Newlands because Falconer had an unqualified title independent of that created by the contract of marriage, whereas Newlands had only one title, in which his right was expressly limited. And in the other case referred to by my brother Lord Deas, of Wilson v. Reid,[2] there also it was the pre-existing title of the wife, as absolute proprietrix of the estate, which was the determining consideration. In Lord Balgray's opinion, which has been referred to, this statement is made—"The disposition in question"—that was, the marriage-contract—"is of a mixed nature, being on the one hand onerous and inter vivos, and on the other mortis causa. The pursuer was at the date of the marriage the absolute and unlimited fiar of the subjects. Now, how was that fee taken out of her? She could not divest herself of the fee by a mere renunciation, or otherwise than by an actual conveyance to and vesting of it in another party. So again, as regarded the heirs of the marriage, this was an onerous deed, and bestowed upon them a jus crediti; but so far as regards the heirs whatsoever it is merely a mortis causa deed, not vesting in them any right whatever, but merely giving them a spes successionis, which could never vest the fee in them." Now, that is just, in my opinion, the position of the heirs whatsoever of Arthur Cumstie in this case. Under this deed, which is of a testamentary character, they have a spes successionis and nothing else during the lifetime of the granter, and they cannot have anything else. But why they should not, when the testament becomes confirmed by the death of the testator, receive that which, ex figura verborum, is given to them, I am not able to see. I do not dispute that it might be possible to get the better of what has hitherto been the universal effect of the use of the word "allenarly" by the use of other words in the deed inconsistent with the notion of a bare liferent, but then I rather apprehend that that would be a contradiction in terms. Suppose a man gets a liferent for his liferent use allenarly, with a full power of disposal, that is a plain contradiction in terms. That is not a liferent for his liferent use allenarly. It is a fee, and therefore it is a misuse of language altogether to call it by that name. The testator himself would in that case have given you the means of contradicting his own words. But without such contradictory expressions in the same deed I am quite unable to believe that a liferent for liferent

No. 149.

June 30, 1876.
Cumstie v. Cumstie's Trustees.

[1] Supra, p. 927.

[2] Supra, p. 928.

No. 149.

June 30, 1876.
Cumstie v. Cumstie's Trustees.

use allenarly either has been or ever can be construed as a fee. Now, the reason which my brother Lord Deas assigns for arriving at the conclusion that this ought to be construed as a fee here is this, that after the children of Arthur Cumstie there is no persona prædilecta to take the fee. That may be so, but is it impossible to constitute a bare liferent and a fee to the heir of line either of the granter of the deed or of the liferenter? I do not see the legal difficulty there. The testator may choose to limit his son, or whoever the party is, to a bare liferent, from considerations which may very easily suggest themselves in many cases—the prodigality of the liferenter, or some other consideration of that kind—his unfitness to be entrusted with the power of disposal of the estate—and yet he may have no predilection for any one beyond that son, and may have no desire to interfere with the operation of the law of succession, but be quite willing that the estate shall go to the son's heirs after his liferent comes to an end. That is surely not an irrational purpose. I cannot believe it to be so. And if it is not an irrational purpose, why may a man not carry it out by such form of expression as is here used; for the literal and obvious meaning of the expression here used is unquestionably what I have just represented. Can there be the least doubt that it was the intention of this gentleman to limit his son to a bare liferent, and at the same time to provide that the fee should go to his heirs whatsoever? He has said so in so many words. I know no legal authority for giving his words any other construction than their obvious and literal meaning, and I know no legal difficulty which should prevent him from having that intention carried out. The notion on the part of my brother Lord Deas seems to be that this limitation of the right of Arthur Cumstie in the first instance was intended merely for the benefit of his issue. If it had been so I think it would have been so expressed, and that was what led me in the outset to say that I do not think the case is just the same as if this had been a liferent allenarly with the fee to the issue of the liferenter's body, and failing them to the heirs whatsoever, because in that case there might have been room for supposing that there was in the mind of the testator a difference between his feelings and desires as regarded the issue of the body of his son and the heirs whatsoever of his son. But it is the absence of any such words here that satisfies me that he intended to make no such distinction, and that he did not care, as regards the disposal of the fee, whether the heir of his son was the heir of his body or an heir of a more remote kind; and therefore it is that he expresses himself in the terms here used, and expresses himself in settling, not one estate only, but two separate subjects, in precisely the same language.

For these reasons, I am of opinion with the majority of the Court and with the Lord Ordinary. I cannot participate in the legal difficulties of my brother Lord Deas, nor see that there is any reason whatever for refusing effect to what appears to me to be the very plainly expressed intention of Mr Cumstie.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the interlocutor: Repel the defences, and find, declare, and decern in terms of the conclusions of the libel as amended; and find the said Arthur Cumstie's Trustees liable in expenses," &c.

D. & W. SHIRESS, S.S.C.—PHILIP, LAING, & MONRO, W.S.—Agents.

WILLIAM MORRISON, Pursuer and Appellant.—Fraser—Rhind.
ABERNETHY SCHOOL BOARD, Defenders and Respondents.—D.-F. Watson—Alison.

No. 150.
July 3, 1876.
Morrison v. Abernethy School Board.

School—Stat. 35 and 36 Vict. cap. 62 (Education Scotland Act, 1872), sec. 55 —Dismissal of Master—Notice.—A schoolmaster appointed by a school board at a salary of £150, and with a free house and garden, was dismissed by the school board without notice, but received fifteen days' pay, being his salary to the end of the quarter current at the date of his dismissal. Held (diss. Lord Neaves and Lord Ormidale) (1) that although in terms of the Education Act, 1872, the pursuer held office only during the pleasure of the board, he was entitled at common law to reasonable notice before dismissal, or to a money payment in lieu thereof; and (2) that, in the circumstances, three months' notice would have been reasonable, and that the pursuer was entitled to £50 in lieu thereof.

Observations (per Lord Deas) as to the law and practice with regard to notice of dismissal.

Opinion (per Lord Neaves and Lord Gifford), that a school board cannot appoint a master otherwise than "during their pleasure."

2D DIVISION, with three consulted Judges. Sheriff of Perthshire.

ON 2d July 1873 the school board of the parish of Abernethy inserted the following advertisement in the "Scotsman" newspaper:—"Master (head) wanted for the public (late parish) school, Abernethy, Perthshire, to enter upon his duties 1st October next. Minimum salary £150, besides house and garden. Liberal encouragement will be given to an experienced energetic teacher," &c.

William Morrison, M.A., Edinburgh, was one of the applicants for the situation, and on 15th July he received a letter from the chairman of the board containing the following passage:—"With great pleasure indeed I have to inform you that you have been chosen unanimously head master of our public school."

Morrison entered on his duties on 1st October of that year, and continued to fill the position of head master of the school till 30th November 1874, when he received a letter from the clerk to the school board in these terms:—"Abernethy School Board, 30th November 1874.—Sir,—At a meeting of the board held this evening I have been instructed to inform you that you are now relieved of your engagement as head master of the Abernethy Public School. The board have agreed that you be paid the current quarter's salary in full.—Yours," &c.

While Morrison had been acting as head master his salary had been paid to him quarterly in instalments of £37, 10s. each, and he had also been allowed to occupy a free house and garden of the annual value of from £18 to £20. The quarter current at the time of his dismissal expired on 15th December, and he was then paid the quarter's salary. Morrison demanded a quarter's salary in lieu of a quarter's notice at the termination of his engagement, but this the school board refused to give him. He accordingly, on 28th December 1874, raised this action against the school board in the Sheriff Court of Perthshire, in which he concluded that "the defenders ought to be decerned to pay to the pursuer the sum of £50 sterling, being loss and damage sustained by the pursuer through the defenders having illegally and unjustifiably dismissed the pursuer on or about the 30th day of November last from his situation as head master of the school at Abernethy, in which situation he was entitled to £150 per annum, together with a free house and garden, with interest thereon at the rate of £5 per centum per annum from the said 30th day of November till payment; the pursuer having, on the 14th day of July 1873, been appointed by the defenders as head master foresaid for the year then ensuing, and having fulfilled his said engagement for a year, he, by tacit relocation, remained engaged as head master foresaid for another year, and entered upon and performed his duties until he was illegally and summarily dismissed as aforesaid without any notice, or a quarter's salary in lieu of notice, for which quarter of a year's salary and emoluments the £50 claimed is an equivalent, with expenses."

No. 150.
July 3, 1876.
Morrison v. Abernethy School Board.

The school board defended the action, and contended that, as under the 15th clause of the 55th section of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872,* the appointment of teachers of public schools was declared to be "during the pleasure of the school board," they were entitled to dismiss the pursuer without notice. They denied that the pursuer's engagement had been a yearly one. They averred that the pursuer had been dismissed for fault, but declined to condescend upon the details of his conduct unless called upon by the Court to do so.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The contract of service between the pursuer and defenders being constituted by said advertisement, minute of the board, and letter of appointment, and the terms thereof being that the pursuer was to have £150 per annum, and a free house and garden, the pursuer was engaged at first as a yearly servant. (2) The pursuer having entered upon and completed the contract of service for the first year, and having entered upon his second year without anything having been said about an alteration of its terms, said contract was renewed between the parties in all its entirety by tacit relocation. (3) A school board dismissing a teacher without fault on his part is bound either to give reasonable notice or pay corresponding compensation or damages. (4) The pursuer having been dismissed during the currency of his second year, without any just cause or previous notice, is entitled to damages for breach of said contract renewed as aforesaid.

The Sheriff-substitute (Barclay), on 22d June 1875, pronounced an interlocutor, which contained, inter alia, the following finding:—"Finds, considering the nature of the office, and the stipulation as to an annual salary, payable quarterly, with the occupancy of a house and garden, and in the absence of any contrary stipulation, the bargain was for a year certain, and which engagement was renewed by tacit relocation for the subsequent year; . . . . and orders the cause to the motion-roll, that parties may be heard as to the amount of damages to be awarded."

The defenders appealed to the Sheriff (Adam), who, on 20th August, recalled his Substitute's interlocutor, and made the following findings:—"Finds (1) that on or about the 14th July 1873 the pursuer was appointed by the defenders, the school board of Abernethy, teacher of the public school of Abernethy; (2) that such appointment was held by him during the pleasure of the school board; (3) that on or about the 30th November 1874 he was dismissed by the board from the said office of teacher of the public school of Abernethy: Finds in law that such dismissal was not illegal: Therefore assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the action: Finds them entitled to expenses," &c.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session.

The case was heard in March by the Second Division, and again in June, with three Judges of the First Division.

Argued for Morrison;—(1) The clause in the statute was meant merely to remove the inconvenience which had been felt from the appointments of parish schoolmasters being ad vitam aut culpam, and was never intended

* Sec. 55, clause 15.—". . . . After the passing of this Act the right and duty to appoint teachers of public schools shall be in the respective school boards having the management of the schools, who shall assign to them such salaries or emoluments as they think fit, and every appointment shall be during the pleasure of the school board."

No. 150.

July 3, 1876.
Morrison v. Abernethy School Board.

to legalise summary dismissal without any notice or compensation for want of notice. The code published by the Privy Council provided for six months' notice to pupil teachers,[1] so surely some sort of notice was due to teachers themselves. The interpretation clause, moreover, referred to pupil teachers. Formerly the parish schoolmasters had been public officers, and could not be removed without regular proceedings and on proper grounds,[2] and the Legislature could never have intended to completely alter and sweep away this altogether. (2) This was a contract of hiring for the year. Wherever the words "per annum" entered a contract of hiring the contract was for a year,[3] and this was even a stronger case, because he was to have a heritable subject—a house and garden—as part of his salary.[4] (3) There was a common law right to every person to have reasonable notice of his dismissal in order that he might look out for a fresh situation. This had been recognised in many cases by the Court.[5] The cases of Pollock's Trustees and Hayman, founded on by the defenders, were not in point, Pollock's Trustees being special, and in Hayman there was four months' notice.[6]

Argued for the school board;—The proviso in the Education Act as to appointments being held at pleasure must be read into every contract, and the school board could not contract itself out of the Act even if it wished.[7] The 55th section had done away with the whole ad vitam aut culpam holding, which had been the real question in dispute in the schoolmasters' cases cited for the pursuer.[8] Where there was a stipulation in a contract of service that the servant might be dismissed at will without cause assigned no claim for damages could arise when the servant was dismissed. It would be contrary to the policy of the statute to make notice necessary. The object of the statute was to enable school boards to supply the best education they could to the children. The right existed to dismiss without notice, but it was not to be exercised oppressively. There was, however, here no attempt to make out a case of oppression—it was a case of breach of contract.

At advising,—

LORD DEAS.—On 2d July 1873 the school board of Abernethy, acting under the Education Scotland Act, 1872 (35 and 36 Vict. c. 62), advertised for a head

---

[1] Sellar's Educ. Act, Introduc., p. 33, note; Code, p. 120, sec. 2, rule 70.

[2] Duff v. Grant, Feb. 20, 1799, M. 9576; Magistrates of Montrose v. Strachan, Jan. 18, 1710, M. 13,118; Adam v. Direct. of Inverness Acad., July 7, 1815, reported 14 Sh. 714, footnote; Gibson v. Direct. of Tain Acad., March 11, 1836, 14 Sh. 710, and Dec. 22, 1837, 16 Sh. 301, aff. H. of L. March 2, 1840, 1 Rob. App. 16, 13 Scot. Jur. 3.

[3] Macfarlane v. Mochrum School Board, May 27, 1875, 12 S. L. R. 457.

[4] Cameron v. Fletcher, Jan. 9, 1872, 10 Macph. 301, 44 Scot. Jur. 169; Bentinck v. Macpherson, Feb. 26, 1869, 6 S. L. R. 376.

[5] Cameron v. Scott, Dec. 7, 1870, 9 Macph. 233, 43 Scot. Jur. 114; Mason v. Scott's Trustees, Jan. 14, 1836, 14 Sh. 343 (Lord Moncreiff, 349); Gordon v. Bell's Trustees, Dec. 13, 1843, 6 D. 222, 16 Scot. Jur. 148; Moffat v. Shedden, Feb. 8, 1839, 1 D. 468, 11 Scot. Jur. 309; Campbell v. Fyfe, June 5, 1851, 13 D. 1041, 23 Scot. Jur. 481.

[6] Pollock's Trustees v. Commercial Bank, H. of L., June 12, 1829, 3 W. and S. 430; Hayman v. Governors of Rugby School, March 21, 1874, L. R. 18 Eq. 28.

[7] Wray v. Darlington Free Grammar School, Nov. 27, 1844, 6 Adolph. and Ellis, Q. B. Rep. 682.

[8] Bell v. Mylne (Dollar Academy case), June 15, 1838, 16 S. 1136, aff. H. of L. May 4, 1841, 2 Rob. App. 286, 14 Scot Jur. 431.

No. 150.

July 3, 1876.
Morrison v. Abernethy School Board.

master for what was lately the parish school, and is now the public school of Abernethy. The advertisement bore:—"The minimum salary to be £150, besides house and garden. Liberal encouragement will be given to an experienced energetic teacher." The pursuer, Mr Morrison, then in Edinburgh, became a candidate for, and was unanimously elected to, the vacant office. He entered upon his duties on 1st October 1873. He occupied the house and garden assigned to him, which is said to have been worth £18 or £20 a-year. His salary of £150 was paid to him in quarterly instalments of £37, 10s. each. Matters continued in this position till 30th November 1875, when, at a meeting of the school board, and without any previous notice to Mr Morrison, a motion was made and carried, "that Mr Morrison be relieved of his engagement as head master of this school, and that his office be now declared vacant; also that Mr Morrison be allowed the salary for the current quarter." This resolution was officially intimated to Mr Morrison by the clerk of the board on the same day.

Mr Morrison shortly afterwards raised an action before the Sheriff of Perthshire against the school board. The summons sets forth in the outset, somewhat inconsistently with what follows, that the pursuer was entitled to damages on the footing of his engagement having been annual, and continued, by tacit relocation, for the year current at the date of his dismissal. But the concluding words of the summons restrict his claim distinctly to "a quarter's salary in lieu of notice, for which quarter of a year's salary and emoluments the £50 claimed is an equivalent." Accordingly, in the 4th article of his condescendence, the pursuer sets forth that he had intimated this claim to the defenders extrajudicially, "and that what he wanted, and still wants, is a quarter's salary in lieu of a quarter's notice." Consistently with his claim, as thus explained, the pursuer's 3d plea in law in the record is,—"A school board dismissing a teacher, without fault on his part, is bound either to give reasonable notice or pay corresponding compensation or damages." The counter plea of the defenders on the merits is—"The pursuer's engagement being only during the pleasure of the defenders, they were entitled to dismiss him at any time." Neither of these pleas are very accurately expressed. For the pursuer's claim, if he has one, is, in my opinion, not for damages but for an allowance, or, as he alternatively calls it, compensation in lieu of notice; and the defenders' plea, on the other hand, although it does not bear on what footing they were entitled to exercise their alleged power of dismissal, really means (and they have so contended at the bar) that they were entitled to dismiss the pursuer at any time without any notice, and without making any allowance to him in lieu of notice. The opposing pleas and statements may therefore fairly be assumed to be sufficient, in a case of this kind, to raise the only question which we are called upon to decide,—namely, whether the pursuer is entitled to any allowance in lieu of notice, and if so, what ought to be the measure of that allowance.

This being so, the first thing, I think, to be settled is, under what category of contracts or engagements does the contract between the pursuer and the school board fall?

In considering this question we must keep in view that the pursuer is not in the position of a parochial schoolmaster, who, under the law as it stood at the date of the Education Scotland Act, 1872, was one of that class of public officers, such as town clerks, &c., who, from the nature of their office, were understood to hold their appointments ad vitam aut culpam. We must also keep in view,

No. 150.
July 8, 1876.
Morrison v. Abernethy School Board.

that by the judgment of the House of Lords in the case of Gibson v. the Directors of the Tain Academy, 2d March 1840 (1 Robinson's App. 16), it was finally settled that teachers and rectors in high class schools and academies, although the institution may be incorporated by Act of Parliament or royal charter, and although these institutions may, in one sense, be called public schools, are not public schools in the sense in which our parochial schools were so, and this, as Lord Ivory observed in his note in Melvin v. the Governors of Gordon's Hospital, 4th December 1841 (4 D. p. 176), at once reduces the question of engagement and power of dismissal of the rectors and teachers in such schools to a mere ordinary question of contract between master and servant. It may or may not be desirable that this should be so, but this appears to me to be the relative position of the masters, whether head or subordinate, in all the public schools established under the authority of the Education Scotland Act, 1872, so far as regards the appointment and tenure of office of the teachers appointed since the passing of that Act. I think the enactment, in section 55 of the Act, that "every appointment shall be during the pleasure of the school board," whatever effect it may have otherwise, has at least the effect of taking the masters in these schools out of the category of public officers in the sense in which parochial teachers were public officers, and of placing them in no higher category, as respects appointment and dismissal, than the rector and teacher of the Tain Academy were held to be in the case of Gibson.

It does not necessarily follow from this that the school board can make no other appointment of a teacher than during pleasure,—that, however difficult or impracticable they may find it to be to obtain the services upon that footing of some high class man upon whom they have set their minds, they cannot appoint him for a year or some other fixed period, or agree that his appointment shall be held to be renewed from term to term, or year to year, failing a specified notice, or payment of a stipulated allowance in lieu of such notice. That is a different and important question upon which I do not enter here, as it is not necessary to do so for the purposes of this case.

There was no special contract in this case between the pursuer and the defenders as to the endurance of the pursuer's term of office. That being so, I think the appointment must be held to have been made in accordance with the 55th section of the Act. I have therefore no hesitation in holding that the pursuer's appointment must be considered to be an appointment during the pleasure of the board, whatever that may imply.

This, then, enables me to solve the first question I proposed to consider, namely, under what category the contract between the pursuer and the defenders falls. The answer I make to that question is, that it falls under the category of an ordinary contract of service for no specific period, and consequently terminable at pleasure.

The next question is, Does such a contract imply, in a case like the present, an obligation on the master or employer to give notice or to make a pecuniary allowance in lieu of notice when he means to terminate the contract, without alleging fault on the part of the servant? And my answer to that question is, that, by the law and practice of Scotland, such a contract does imply that obligation.

Even where the contract is for a stipulated period, such as for a year or half a year, notice falls, in the general case, to be given, or an allowance made in lieu of notice, otherwise tacit relocation takes place. I need not go over the list of familiar cases, including those of domestic and agricultural servants, gardeners, foresters, gamekeepers, and others, in which this has been decided. See, for instance, MacLean v. Fyfe (the case of a gardener), Feb. 4, 1813, F.C., and the case of an agricultural servant, Cameron v. Scott, Dec. 7, 1870, 9 Macph. 233. It appears to me, a fortiori, to follow that, when the contract is during pleasure, there must, in the general case, be notice, or a sum paid in lieu of notice.

No. 150.

July 2, 1876.
Morrison v. Lanarkshire School Board.

The object in both classes of cases is the same,—to give the servant a fair opportunity of looking out for and obtaining another situation, instead of being thrown suddenly and unexpectedly upon the world, with, it may be a wife and family to support, and no means, either from savings or otherwise, of supporting either himself or them.

It is even more necessary that this rule should be applicable to the higher class of servants, such as managers and other officers of banks, insurance offices, railway companies, and many other companies and employers, than to those in an inferior position, because it is much more expedient and much more common that such persons should hold their appointments during pleasure than that servants of an inferior class should do so; and there is a more clear implication in the one case than in the other that a considerable period of employment is reasonably to be expected, although not actually stipulated for.

In all cases of exuberant trust it is important for the master or employer that he should be able at any moment to stop the actings and intromissions of his servant, and the higher the position of the servant the more necessary this power comes to be. But, on the other hand, the higher the position of the servant the greater is the expediency, on grounds of public policy, that he should not be discouraged from accepting and continuing in such precarious employment by the additional risk of being left at any moment without either time or means to enable him to look out for and obtain another situation.

All this applies, I think, in a high degree to a master or head master in a public school. To tempt men of learning and ability to agree to hold such an office at the pleasure of their employers—especially at the pleasure of a popular board,—it is expedient that they should feel assured that the law will allow them the means of subsistence for at least some limited period after they have been dismissed without cause assigned. The voluntary liberality with which the directors of many institutions treat their officials when they discontinue their services can hardly be expected from a school board. A schoolmaster, moreover, is peculiarly helpless if driven to seek employment out of his own element. His learning and his habits disqualify him rather than otherwise for many occupations to which other professional men might readily turn. On the other hand, it is highly expedient that the school board should be able to discontinue the employment of the schoolmaster at any moment, because they may have good reasons connected with the interests of the pupils and the welfare of the institution which they are not prepared to avow or to prove, and which it would not be expedient either to avow or to attempt to prove. The case of a schoolmaster is therefore a case to which it is peculiarly expedient that the rule should apply, that failing notice being given a reasonable allowance should be made in lieu of notice. It was at one time the practice of this Court to protect the better class of servants who held their offices at the pleasure of their employers, and particularly schoolmasters, not parochial, from being arbitrarily and oppressively dismissed, by requiring that there should appear to have been grounds for presuming fault—taking that word as including any reasonable cause for dissatisfaction,—of which we have instances in the cases of the Magistrates of Montrose v. Strachan, 18th January 1710 (M. 13,118); Kempt v. the Magistrates of Irvine (M. 13,136); The Schoolmaster of Dunsyre, 1777 (M. 131,377), and other cases.

No. 150.
July 3, 1876.
Morrison v. Abernethy School Board.

Gradually, however, it came to be thought that the sounder and more expedient rule, where the appointment was one during pleasure, was to hold that all that was incumbent on the employer was either to give reasonable notice before dismissal, or to make a reasonable allowance to the schoolmaster or other party employed in lieu of notice.

The case of Pollock's Trustees v. The Commercial Bank of Scotland, decided in the House of Lords 12th June 1829 (3 W. and S. 430) did not raise any question of that kind, as the company had voluntarily allowed Mr Pollock his salary to the end of the year, which had five months to run at the date of his dismissal. Mr Pollock claimed to hold his office as manager of the bank ad vitam aut culpam, or alternatively by the year; and the point decided was that he held during pleasure only, and had been validly dismissed with the approval of two-thirds of the committee of management, as provided for by the constitution of the company.

The case of Mason v. Scott, 23d July 1836 (14 S. and D. 343), was the case of the master of a school on a private foundation, in connection with the Episcopal congregation of St James', Edinburgh. The only point directly raised was whether Mason held his office ad vitam aut culpam, which was ruled against him; but Lord Moncreiff, Ordinary, observed in his note that "the very utmost that can be made of the correspondence is that it was an indefinite hiring or employment, if it even admits of this construction, and though such employment might imply that the complainer was not to be removed without some reasonable notice, it never could import an appointment for his life, or such an appointment as to preclude the trustees from removing him upon reasonable notice."

The suggestion of his Lordship in this note is very valuable, for it lays the foundation of what is now, I think, recognised as the true principle applicable to such cases. Money is a universal solvent, and it was an easy transition from the necessity of reasonable notice to allowing the alternative of a reasonable allowance in lieu of such notice.

In the case of Mitchell v. Smith, 26th January 1836, 14 S. 358, Mitchell held his office of manager of the Western Bank on condition that it should be in the power of two-thirds of the ordinary directors to dismiss him when they saw occasion. They did dismiss him, but without assigning any cause, and the whole ground of action was that the directors could not legally do so without assigning special cause, of the sufficiency of which it was for the Court to judge. On this footing Mitchell concluded that the company should be ordained to "restore and reinstate" him in his office, or to pay damages, that is to say, damages for not reinstating him in his office, and this, of course, was disallowed.

In the Dollar Academy case, Bell v. Mylne, 15th June 1838, (16 S. and D. 1136, and F.C.), affirmed in the House of Lords 4th May 1841 (2 Robinson, 286), the appointment bore expressly to be during pleasure, and Mr Bell's claim to a life tenure was negatived. In April 1838 it had been intimated to Mr Bell that his services would not be required after the following Whitsunday, but that his salary would be paid up to 1st October, and his house rent up to

No. 150.
July 3, 1876.
Morrison v. Abernethy School Board.

Martinmas. In these respects, therefore, he had no cause of complaint, so that in this case again the question was avoided by a liberal allowance being made.

The recent case of Hayman v. The Governors of Rugby School, March 1874, 18 Law Rep., Equity Cases, p. 28, was mentioned at the bar, but in that case there was abundance of notice, and the other points involved, which alone were dealt with, have no application whatever to the present case.

The case of Moffat v. Shedden, 8th July 1839 (1 D. 468), in like manner did not raise the question, because the ground on which the family tutor there got three quarters of a year's salary and an allowance for bed and board was that his engagement was held to have been for a year. But the case is valuable for the opinion of Lord President Hope, who held the engagement to have been during pleasure, but who said,—"I apprehend that the connection of the parties might be brought to a close by either of them, upon reasonable and equitable notice being given of the period of its termination. If such notice were not given then compensation must be due in respect of the failure to give it." (P. 472.)

I think that the law as thus laid down by Lord President Hope is the general law of master and servant, where the employment is during pleasure, and contemplates some considerable period of endurance. I think, farther, that it is the law applicable to the present case.

There has been little occasion for direct decision upon the present point, because several of the cases I have cited, as well as the practice which we know to prevail in high class establishments, shew that the principle of the law has been voluntarily given effect to—I do not say because it was conceded to be the law, but certainly because it was considered to be equitable, and that of itself is by no means unimportant in a question of this kind.

The only remaining question is, what shall be held reasonable notice or a reasonable allowance in lieu of notice?

That is a question which does not admit of any general or abstract answer. It is necessarily, to a considerable extent, a question of circumstances. What the pursuer is entitled to is not damages for illegal dismissal. There was no breach of contract on the part of the defenders. The contract was that they should retain the pursuer in their service during pleasure, but it was an implied condition of that contract that, when they dispensed with his services without cause assigned, he should be allowed the means of livelihood for a period within which he might reasonably be expected to find another situation. That I think the fair and reasonable construction to be put upon such a contract. The nature of the office to which the pursuer was appointed implied the contemplation, on both sides, of a period of some endurance,—for the frequent shifting of the head master of a school is not a thing which would suit either the institution or the master, who may have given up for it another, although not a better, situation, and whose opportunity of obtaining another in its place is necessarily limited and precarious. The pursuer, although he says his engagement falls to be construed as a yearly engagement, does not conclude for or claim the salary and emoluments for the remainder of the year on which he was dismissed, some seven and a half months before its alleged termination, and that of itself is a conclusive answer to the footing on which the Sheriff-substitute seems to have contemplated assessing the sum due to him. He claims the salary and emoluments for three months only. At the same time it is a fact favourable to the pursuer's claim for a substantial amount, that part of his emoluments consisted of a dwelling-house and garden, and that fact militates strongly against the view of the Sheriff that he might be dismissed at any moment with no allowance whatever, for he could not, like the tortoise, carry away his house on his back, nor could he expect to find by remaining in it another situation to his mind in the ancient Pictish burgh of Abernethy.

No. 150.
July 3, 1876.
Morrison v. Abernethy School Board.

The defenders have allowed the pursuer his salary to the end of the quarter current at the date of his dismissal, that is, as I understand it, for the period of fifteen days. The only hesitation I have felt in the case has been in interfering with the discretion which the defenders have exercised as to the amount of the allowance they have thus made to the pursuer, although they have not made it on the footing of its being in lieu of notice, but ex gratia merely. Where a school board or other employers recognise the principle on which the schoolmaster or other servant is entitled to an allowance on being dismissed without fault assigned from an employment during pleasure, I should be slow to interfere with their discretion fairly exercised as to the amount. Still I think they must in all cases be subject to the equitable control of the Court in that matter. If our estimation of the amount must necessarily be somewhat arbitrary, theirs must be equally so, and our judgment is likely to be at least as impartial as theirs. I think that, in this case, the fact that the pursuer's salary had been always paid quarterly is a fact to be taken into view along with the other circumstances, and, on the whole, I am of opinion that the allowance to be made to the pursuer in lieu of notice cannot fairly be estimated at less than what is concluded for, viz., a quarter's salary and emoluments from the date of dismissal, and, in that view, it is not said in the record, nor has it been contended at the bar, that these are otherwise than fairly represented by the sum of £50.

LORD NEAVES.—I am sorry that there should be a difference of opinion on the bench in this case; but I am obliged, after full consideration, to dissent from the judgment just expressed, and to hold that the action is wholly groundless. I think that any other decision would be an infringement of the new system established by the Education Act, and a great blow to that system, and I think that the grounds on which the judgment is supported are fraught with even greater danger than the judgment itself.

A new era in education was introduced by the Education Act of 1872. When parochial schools were established in Scotland the parochial schoolmasters were made public officers, which, according to the established rule of Scotch law, enabled them to hold office ad vitam aut culpam. Such a tenure of office was then thought necessary for every public officer, in order to secure a fearless discharge of duty. Fixity of tenure is a great thing to struggle for, whether in a tenant or a public officer, and it is often found to secure a better person than a more precarious tenure. In progress of time, however, it was found that the tenure of office by a parochial schoolmaster ad vitam aut culpam was attended with evils. It was seen that as men got old or old fashioned they became drones in the hive in which they had formerly made honey. In such cases it was difficult to get them out. It was possible to do so by alleging fault and proving it; but this was an operose proceeding, and attended with difficulty and uncertainty. The Legislature has thought fit that this system should come to an end. The 55th section of the Education Act thus enacts—"After the passing of this Act the right and duty to appoint teachers of public schools shall be in the respective school boards having the management of the schools, who shall assign

No. 150.
July 3, 1876.
Morrison v. Abernethy School Board.

to them such salaries or emoluments as they think fit, and every appointment shall be during the pleasure of the school board." The pursuer was a teacher of a public school, appointed after the passing of the Act, and therefore his appointment was during the pleasure of the school board. I do not think that a school board, even if they wish to do so, can appoint a teacher for a fixed period, to the effect of anticipating the powers of their successors. The tenure of the schoolmaster is the pleasure of the school board for the time being. The moment that it is their pleasure to dispense with his services, and that this is intimated to him, he ceases to be schoolmaster. Indeed, I do not think that my brother Lord Deas holds that in this case the pursuer can retain his office. The question, then, arises substantially in this form, whether, when there can be only one schoolmaster, there can be two salaries—whether a man can draw the schoolmaster's salary who is not the schoolmaster, so as either to make two salaries run contemporaneously, or whether the man who no longer holds the office can draw the salary while the man who holds it does not get the salary, or not the full salary. The grounds of action appear to me extravagant, and directly in the teeth of the statute. In his summons the pursuer says that he was appointed in July 1873 for a year, "and having fulfilled his said engagement for a year he, by tacit relocation, remained engaged as head master foresaid for another year, and entered upon and performed his duties until he was illegally and summarily dismissed as aforesaid without any notice, or a quarter's salary in lieu of notice." If the pursuer, as he says, continued to hold the office, and was illegally dismissed, that is an intelligible but an utterly untenable ground of claim. If, on the other hand, the pursuer's tenure of office has ceased by virtue of the very nature of his appointment, how comes the pursuer to have any claim for the salary of an office which he does not hold? It is said, however, that we may ignore what is stated as the grounds of action, viz., tacit relocation and illegal dismissal, and confine ourselves to the claim for a quarter's salary in lieu of notice. If it be said that the only way of dismissing a schoolmaster legally is to tell him that he is to go away after three months, I think this is at utter variance with the statute. A schoolmaster may commit the most grievous faults, and yet it may be highly inexpedient that any investigation should take place. I have not a doubt that one of the inducements which led the Legislature to pass this enactment was to render such investigations unnecessary. Take, then, the case of a schoolmaster dismissed upon grounds such as I have indicated, brought home to the convictions of the school board, but which they were not bound, and have no occasion or call to make the subject of public or judicial investigation: According to Lord Deas' view, one of three things must happen. Either the schoolmaster is to get three months' more law to corrupt the minds or pervert the scholarship of his pupils, if that is what he is doing, or he is to be dismissed expressly on cause shewn, and in order to escape liability the school board must enter upon an investigation before the Sheriff or other Court of the kind, which it was the object of the Legislature to avoid; or, in the last place, the school board must pay a quarter's salary to the teacher whom they thus consider, and are entitled to consider, as unfit for his office. I cannot hold that this is an admissible construction of the statute, and I do not think that any of the cases under the common law which have been cited are applicable. The warning of servants, for instance, is a thing which has existed at common law for centuries for the protection of the poorer classes; but that does not apply to higher appointments. I cannot hold that there was

No. 150.
July 3, 1876.
Morrison v. Abernethy School Board.

tacit relocation of the pursuer, or that he was entitled to notice. If there was no right to notice there could be no wrong in not giving notice, and no damages for dismissal, for damages can only be due when there has been a wrong done.

This is not a common law matter. We are dealing with a statute which has made a fundamental alteration in the tenure of a schoolmaster. The school board are bound to appoint during their pleasure, and when their bene placitum ceases they are bound to terminate the appointment.

Something has been said as to the hardship of hurrying a man out of his house at a moment's notice. There is, however, a difference between depriving a man of his office, and putting the executorials into force by actual ejection from possession of premises. The use of diligence is analogous. A creditor may have an undoubted warrant to poind, yet he cannot carry out the poinding in the middle of the night. He may have an undoubted warrant of incarceration, yet he cannot pull the debtor out of his bed when dying, or execute his diligence on Sunday. The execution of diligence is regulated by humanity, so as to give such indulgence, or such limited indulgence, as it would be shameful to refuse. But this has nothing to do with pecuniary rights, and would not extend as to physical possession beyond the period necessary for removal, from considerations of decency and good order. The right to use diligence or execute ejection is a matter of common law; but it has no bearing on the present case, and the summons gives no indication of any such ground of complaint.

Upon the whole, I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Sheriff should be adhered to.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I concur in the result of Lord Deas' opinion. I think it of importance that the judgment now given should be so guarded as to prevent misunderstanding, for there ought to be no doubt in regard to the relations existing between the school board and the teachers.

It appears to me clear that under this Education Act the teachers appointed since the date of the Act hold their office at the pleasure of the school board. These teachers are liable to be dismissed by the school board at any time, and without cause assigned. This is a change in the law; but it is intended to promote, and I do not doubt that it is calculated to promote, the efficiency of the schools and the interests of education, and we are administering the law as it now exists.

This teacher held his appointment at the pleasure of the board, and the board were entitled to dismiss him when they thought fit, and they have dismissed him. He stands dismissed, and there can be no doubt that he has been legally dismissed.

But, assuming this, the question remains, whether reasonable notice, or a reasonable payment in lieu of notice, ought not to be given; for it may be that the propriety and the duty of giving some notice may exist quite consistently with the right of dismissal at pleasure.

I am disposed to hold that this summons is not well framed, for I do not think that there was engagement for a year, or any term of engagement, or that there has been or could be any relocation. All that is quite out of the question. I doubt the right to make a special agreement limiting the power to dismiss. But, at anyrate, no such agreement is here. The teacher cannot, in my opinion, retain his position or his office for a day after his dismissal against the will of the school board. The teacher cannot hold his office in defiance of the school board. Their dismissal of him, when duly sanctioned, is conclusive. But a reasonable notice, to enable the teacher to look out for another situation, or at least for another home, is, I think, in fairness, required; or, instead of notice, a reasonable sum, proportioned to the notice, is just and proper. This appears to me to be in accordance with the opinion of Lord President Hope in the case of Moffat.

No. 150.
July 3, 1876.
Morrison v. Abernethy School Board.

Your Lordships are disposed to hold three months to be reasonable notice, or three months' salary to be a reasonable allowance in place of notice. I do not differ from that conclusion.

The teacher is an educated man, suddenly dismissed, it may be without fault, at least without cause alleged. Some notice is due to a man dismissed under such circumstances, even though he holds his office at pleasure, for he is turned not only out of his situation, but out of his house and his garden; and while I think three months is a very liberal proposal, I am not prepared to say that three months' notice is unreasonable. In requiring reasonable notice, or reasonable compensation in lieu of notice, I concur with Lord Deas. I only add that I give this opinion in regard to the executorial procedure for enforcing removal without any compromise of my view—as decided as that of any of my brethren—that the teacher holds office at the pleasure of the school board, and that he may be dismissed by the board without cause assigned.

Lord Ormidale.—I entirely concur with Lord Neaves in his observations on the terms of the summons in this case, and as to the ground of action there libelled. And it is not unimportant to keep in view that by the statute which regulates the form of procedure in Sheriff Courts (16 and 17 Vict. cap. 80, sec. 1) the ground of action must be set out in the summons itself. It is there, and there alone, it must be looked for. This being so, I do not well see how the barrier to the appellant's succeeding in his present contention, interposed by the terms of his own summons, and his ground of action as there set out, can be got over. But, independently of that or any other objection of a technical nature, I think he has failed to shew any sufficient reason for disturbing the judgment of the Sheriff appealed against.

The leading question in the case is, what was the tenure, as respects endurance, of the appellant Mr Morrison's appointment as schoolmaster of the parish of Abernethy. Now, although at first it seemed to be contended in argument on the part of Mr Morrison that his appointment was, in accordance with his ground of action, as libelled, a yearly one, this contention was ultimately not pressed, and it was, as I understood, conceded that the appointment was at the pleasure of the board. But, at any rate, this is a matter, as it appears to me, so clear as to make it of no importance whether it was conceded on the part of the appellant or not. The appointment he held was that of schoolmaster of the parish of Abernethy, in terms of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, (35 and 36 Vict. cap. 62), which, by its 55th section, enacts that "after the passing of this Act the right and duty to appoint teachers of public schools shall be in the respective school boards having the management of the schools, who shall assign to them such salaries and emoluments as they think fit, and every appointment shall be during the pleasure of the school board." It would be idle therefore to contend that the appointment of the appellant, who undoubtedly received his appointment from the school board of the parish of Abernethy,

No. 150.

July 3, 1876.

Morrison v. Abernethy School Board.

acting under and in the exercise of the statutory powers thus conferred upon them, and who does not say that there was anything special in his engagement, but expressly admits in his answer to the third article of the defenders' statement of facts that there was not, now to dispute that the tenure of his apppointment, as regards its endurance depended entirely on the pleasure of the defenders, the school board. Indeed, it is very clear, according to any view I can take of the matter, that the defenders had not the power, even had they been disposed, to make any appointment of schoolmaster except during the pleasure of the school board.

Assuming, therefore, that the appellant held his appointment during the pleasure of the defenders as the school board of Abernethy, it seems necessarily to follow that they were entitled to bring it to a termination whenever they pleased, and without assigning any cause or establishing any fault as justifying the dismissal of the pursuer. The statute does not require anything of that kind, and I can very well understand that it might be very inexpedient that it should. From many circumstances, which cannot well be made the subject of a proof and might possibly not be capable of being judicially established, it might nevertheless be advisable, if not absolutely necessary, having regard to the interests of a school, that the teacher should be removed, and so the power of dismissal in their discretion and at their pleasure has been conferred on the school board. Nor can it be reasonably supposed that this is a power which is likely to be improperly exercised by a body of individuals elected by the ratepayers, presumably in respect of their integrity, and fitness generally, for the important duties they have to discharge. Neither, on the other hand, has the schoolmaster who accepts an appointment, subject to the contingency of his being dismissed at the pleasure of the school board, any right to complain of the exercise of their power, for it is to be presumed that his salary and emoluments were calculated and accepted of by him with a view to that contingency.

I am not, however, to be understood to mean that a schoolmaster may not be wrongously dismissed—that is to say, dismissed in such a way and under such circumstances as to entitle him to maintain a claim for damages against the wrongdoers; as, for example, in the case of the dismissal having been brought about by a conspiracy on the part of some of the members of the school board or others, and carried into effect by corrupt and fraudulent means; or of a dismissal accompanied by false and malicious statements injuriously affecting the character and conduct of the schoolmaster. But the present is not a case of that description. On the contrary, it is manifest, on the appellant's own shewing, having regard to his statements in the record, that assuming the defenders had the power of dismissing him at any time they pleased, the way and manner in which they exercised their power,—apart from absence of warning or previous notice, a point that will be immediately noticed,—was wholly unobjectionable.

But it was strenuously urged for the pursuer—and ultimately, as I understood, it was the sole foundation of his argument—that the defenders were at least bound to have given him a quarter of a year's warning or notice that he was to be dismissed, and that as they gave him no such warning or notice they are liable to him, in lieu thereof, in a quarter's salary. This claim, as made by the appellant in his summons and record, proceeds on the assumption that his appointment was for at least a year. Accordingly, in his summons he expressly states that on the 14th of July 1873 he was appointed by the defenders as head master of the school of Abernethy "for the year then ensuing, and having fulfilled his engagement for a year, he, by tacit relocation, remained engaged as head master foresaid for another year." Nor only so, but apparently apprehensive that he had not made this, his ground of action, quite clear, he, by the minute No. 25 of process, repeated his statement that his engagement had been a yearly one, and that he had been dismissed after the engagement had by tacit relocation been renewed for another year. Now, if the appellant's engagement had been a yearly one, his right to warning or notice might have been maintainable, although why it should be a quarter of a year is not so clear. But if the appellant's appointment was not a yearly one, but determinable at pleasure, as I hold it beyond all doubt to have been, the case of the appellant entirely fails. It would, indeed, be a contradiction in terms to say that his appointment was terminable at the pleasure of the school board, and at the same time to say that he was entitled to a quarter of a year's warning or notice.

No. 150.
July 3, 1876.
Morrison v. Abernethy School Board.

Many decided cases were referred to on the part of the appellant, at the debate, as shewing that according to established law and practice individuals engaged in various departments of service were entitled to some warning or notice before their engagement could be terminated by the master or employer, but in all these cases the engagement was from its terms held to be for a year or other period of time; and consequently, by usage and common law, warning or notice of dismissal was in these cases necessary to prevent a renewal of the engagement by tacit relocation. But it is difficult to understand how tacit relocation could operate except in cases of that description. I do not, for example, see how it could operate at all in the case of an engagement terminable by express contract at the pleasure of the master or employer, for it is necessarily of the very essence of such an engagement that it may be brought to a conclusion at any time the master or employer thinks proper; and in such a case also the elements of usage and common law are excluded by the terms of the contract.

Accordingly, the precedents are, I think, conclusive to the effect that no warning or notice of dismissal is necessary where the engagement or appointment is during pleasure. In the case of The Commercial Bank v. Pollock's Trustees, as decided in the House of Lords, reversing, so far as the present point is considered, a judgment of this Court (2d June 1829, 3 Wilson and Shaw's App. p. 430) it was held that while the servant—in that case the manager of the bank—was in terms of his appointment dismissible at the pleasure of the directors of the bank, and without cause assigned, no allusion is made to previous warning or notice, and no point was attempted to be made as regards that matter. No doubt an allowance of some months' salary seems to have been given to the dismissed manager, but this was ex gratia of the bank directors, and not in respect of any obligation incumbent on them; and I think it obvious from the observations of the Lord Chancellor that he did not consider that any warning or notice of dismissal was necessary, or that there could be a claim for damages or compensation in lieu of it. His Lordship remarked, indeed, in reference to the dismissed manager's claim for compensation, that he could find "no stipulation whatever —no clause whatever—entitling Mr Pollock to the benefit of any compensation or any retiring provision in the event of his being removed. I find, therefore," his Lordship added, "no subsisting contract which entitles Mr Pollock to any compensation." And again, a little further on, the Lord Chancellor observes— "It appears to me that the committee of management had an absolute discretion to remove Mr Pollock when they thought proper, that they were not responsible for the manner in which they exercised that discretion, and that they were not bound to make any compensation or remuneration to Mr Pollock for the loss he sustained in consequence of that removal." So, in like manner in the case of another bank manager, the manager of the Western Bank (Mitchell v. Smith, 26th January 1836, 14 Sh. 358) which came before this Court soon after the judgment in the House of Lords in the Commercial Bank v. Pollock's Trustees, it was held that the appointment of the manager being one during the pleasure of the bank, they could dismiss him when they pleased, and were not bound to justify the dismissal. In that case the pursuer concluded for restoration to office, and alternatively for damages. Lord Moncreiff, who was Ordinary in the case, and whose judgment was adhered to by the Court, made the following important observations, which, I think, are equally applicable to the present case: —"There is no case of damages," his Lordship observed, "raised by the summons on the independent ground of injury arising from anything in the particular time, mode, or terms in which the dismissal took place, supposing there was otherwise power to do the act. And, indeed, it is plain that if the power existed the defenders might comply with the first alternative to the effect of restoring the pursuer, and so put an end to the action, and then immediately dismiss him in some more formal and simple manner according to their own view of the matter." This case of Mitchell v. Smith is all the more important as a precedent for the present inasmuch as I find from the session papers that there, as here, the dismissed manager had, besides his salary, a house and offices; and further, that not only no notice or warning of his dismissal was given to him, but also that he received no allowance whatever in lieu of such notice or warning.

No. 150.

July 3, 1876.
Morrison v. Abernethy School Board.

Besides, these cases of the dismissals of bank managers, which appear to me to be precedents in point—for the circumstance of the dismissed employee in the present case being a schoolmaster cannot, I think, affect the legal principle—there are some cases of the dismissal of schoolmasters. I do not refer to the cases of the Tain Academy and others of the same description, where warning required to be given by the terms of the engagement. These cases are not in point. But in Bell v. Mylne and Others, 15th June 1838, 16 Sh. 1136 (the Dollar Academy case) a schoolmaster holding office merely during the pleasure of his employers was dismissed by them without any notice or warning; and I do not think it is of any consequence, as regards the legal principle, that an allowance of some months' salary appears to have been given to him through the liberality of his employers, but not in consequence of any obligation on them to do so. It was in that case distinctly ruled that the schoolmaster having accepted the appointment to be held during the pleasure of his employers, it was in their power to remove him whenever they pleased, without assigning any cause, and therefore that his plea for damages was unfounded. The learned Judges were unanimous in the case, and I find that Lord Corehouse remarked "that it is altogether new to me to hear it maintained that a power of dismissal at pleasure cannot be made the subject of legitimate stipulation at the appointment of a teacher. In the decisions which have been referred to by the pursuer there was nothing to warrant such doctrine. In the case of the Inverness Academy, for instance, there was no power of dismissal conferred on the managers by the charter except upon proper grounds. In the present instance it appears to have been quite right that the appointment was made during pleasure only; and in general, where there is a good body of judicious managers having the right to elect, I am not sure that it is wrong to qualify the appointment by a declaration that it shall be held only during pleasure."

No. 150.
July 3, 1876.
Morrison v. Abernethy School Board.

There is also, in conformity with these views, the recent English case—and it has not been suggested that the laws of England and Scotland are different as regards such a question as the present—of Hayman v. The Governors of Rugby School, Law Reports, Equity Cases, vol. xviii. p. 68. In that case Vice-Chancellor Malins, whose judgment, I believe, was acquiesced in, stated—"It is in my opinion clear that the plaintiff and all the head masters of the public schools to which the Act of 1868 applies are subject to the control of the new governing body of each school, and that they hold their office at the pleasure merely of the new governing body, and are consequently liable to be dismissed without notice, and without any reason being assigned." If the principle as so expressed be sound and applicable to the present case—and I am not aware of any ground on which it is not, and certainly none was suggested at the debate—it is difficult to see any reason for interfering with the judgment appealed against.

The case may perhaps be a hard one for Mr Morrison, the appellant, and possibly other hard cases may occasionally occur in relation to the dismissal of schoolmasters holding appointments under the Education Acts, but these are not considerations by which the Court can be influenced. The contract between the appellant and the respondents cannot be re-formed; it must be given effect to as it stands. The only question, therefore, the Court has to determine is whether the appellant has in the present instance any maintainable claim for damages against the respondents in respect of breach of contract or other wrong done to him. Now, as I have been unable, for the reasons I have stated, and having regard to the authorities to which I have referred, to see that he has, it follows that, in my opinion, the interlocutor of the Sheriff appealed against ought to be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed.

Lord Mure.—The question which we have to decide, as I understand it, relates to the position of a schoolmaster appointed during the pleasure of a school board, under the 55th section of the Education Act, for such was the position of the pursuer. He has endeavoured, but has, I think, failed to bring himself within the category of persons holding office for a fixed period.

It has been maintained, on the one hand, that when a schoolmaster so appointed is dismissed, he is entitled to reasonable notice of the intention to remove him, or to compensation in lieu of notice. On the other hand, it has been maintained that the board has, by this statute, been authorised to dismiss a schoolmaster appointed under it without any notice, and to remove him at once not only from his office but also from his house and garden without any warning; and this power on the part of the board must, as it appears to me, involve a correlative right on the part of the schoolmaster to leave his situation at any time without notice to the board of his intention to take that step. Now, one object of this statute undoubtedly was to change the tenure of the office of schoolmasters from that of being ad vitam aut culpam to that of during pleasure, because considerable evils and inconveniences had been found to arise from the ad vitam aut culpam tenure; and one main object of the 55th section of the Act was to put an end to those evils. But while the Act did this, I cannot think that it was the intention of the Legislature to give any such power to school boards, as has here been contended, or to reduce the relative position of parties to a state of uncertainty, which would in all probability lead to inconveniencies as great as any of those which the Act was intended to remedy. The words of the 55th section do not, I conceive, necessarily lead to such a result. It no doubt allows boards to act on their own will and pleasure, and to change a master without assigning any special grounds for doing so. But while it does this, it does not, as I read it, entitle school boards to act, in the matter of dismissal, except under the equitable considerations as to notice, which are, I think, applicable in all such cases.

By the rules of the law of Scotland I have always understood that in all cases between master and servant there must either be reasonable notice given of the intention to make a change or reasonable compensation. In the case of Moffat v. Shedden the law upon this subject was so laid down by Lord President Hope in regard to a tutor. In that case the party had not been engaged for any fixed time, in the view his Lordship took of the agreement, and he said,—"It was matter of implied understanding that though a salary at so much per annum, payable quarterly, was referred to in the letter, the continuance of the employment could only be in the event of the parties being mutually satisfied. So soon as there was no mutual satisfaction, no mutual confidence, I apprehend that the connection of the parties might be brought to a close by either of them, upon reasonable and equitable notice being given of the period of its termination. If such notice were not given, then compensation must be due in respect of the failure to give it." That opinion is, I think, applicable to contracts terminable at pleasure, and similar views were expressed by Lord President Boyle in Campbell v. Fyfe, June, 5, 1851, 13 D. 1041.

There is another branch of the law of Scotland in which it has been held that a contract at pleasure cannot be terminated without notice, viz., that of tenants at will. In the case of the Queensberry leases (March 11, 1756, M. p. 13,843), it was decided that the cottars of the principal tenant, though they paid no rent and held no leases, could not be removed without reasonable notice, which was fixed at fifteen days; and a similar rule was applied in Chirnside v. Park, March 8, 1843, 5 D. 864.

I have examined the cases of Pollock and Mitchell,[1] which were cited for the defenders, and I certainly had at first some difficulty in dealing with the question here raised, having regard to the opinion of Lord Moncreiff in the case of Mitchell. Both these cases proceeded on special contracts between the banks and their agents, and in neither of them was any question directly raised as to the sufficiency of notice. In the first, that question was obviated by the payment of five or six months' salary, and in the case of Mitchell the action proceeded on the assumption that the directors had no power to dismiss without special reasons, and the summons concluded for declarator to that effect, with an alternative conclusion for damages for dismissal without cause; and I see that Lord Moncreiff stated,—"There is no case of damages raised by the summons on the independent ground of injury arising from anything in the particular time, mode, or terms in which the dismissal took place, supposing that there was otherwise power to do the act." This observation as to the time and mode or terms of dismissal seems to me to be important, and to imply pretty clearly that if any question as to the necessity of some fair notice had there been raised

[1] Pollock v. Commercial Bank, June 12, 1829, 3 W. and S. App. 430; Smith v. Mitchell, Jan. 26, 1836, 14 S. 358.

No. 150. July 3, 1876. Morrison v. Abernethy School Board.

his Lordship would have been free to deal with it on the principles of the cases to which I have referred; and, upon the whole, I concur with the majority of your Lordships.

LORD GIFFORD.—I agree with Lord Deas and the majority of your Lordships.

I think that the true meaning and effect of section 55 of the Education Act of 1872 is that every schoolmaster appointed under the Act shall hold his office simply at the pleasure of the school board, and not either for life or for any fixed period. I think it quite impossible to read the enactment as providing that the school boards may fix "at their pleasure" any definite time during which the schoolmaster shall have a right to hold office,—in short, that the school board shall have liberty to contract according to circumstances. On the contrary, I think the statute deprives the school board of all power in the matter, and prevents them from making any time-engagement whatever with the teachers whom they may appoint. The statute appears to me to be imperative in its terms, and to fix in all cases the character of the employment and appointment. The words are,—"Every appointment shall be during the pleasure of the school board." It is not "for such period as the school board may fix"—it leaves the school board no discretion. They cannot elect for life, or ad vitam aut culpam, or for a period of years, but only "during pleasure." The school board is a varying body, and the board of any particular date cannot bind its successors, or even itself, for any time. The enactment seems to me to be that the office of teacher shall be precarious at the pleasure of the respective boards. With the policy of this provision I have no concern. If the enactment is clear it must receive effect,—and I read it as equivalent to a provision, that every schoolmaster under the Act may be dismissed at any time and at the mere pleasure of the school board. I cannot therefore agree with the Sheriff-substitute, who finds that the bargain was for a year certain, renewable by tacit relocation. On the contrary, I agree with the Sheriff-principal that the appointment was during pleasure, and terminable whenever the school board should choose.

But the question remains, and indeed it is the only question really at issue between the parties, whether a schoolmaster appointed under the Education Scotland Act, 1872, and holding office "during the pleasure of the school board," is entitled to reasonable notice of his dismissal where no fault is alleged or proved, or to a proportion of his salary and emoluments corresponding to such reasonable notice.

Of course the right of the school board to dispense with the teacher's services, and to deprive him, without any notice, of the control and superintendence of the school, is not disputed. This is a power which exists in every contract of employment of a personal nature, and belongs to every master or employer where there is a delectus personæ. The only question is the pecuniary question, whether the servant's or schoolmaster's emoluments are to run on for whatever time may be held to be reasonable notice.

Now, here I feel myself compelled to differ from the Sheriff-principal, and I am of opinion that a schoolmaster, although he holds his office simply "during the pleasure" of the school board, is yet entitled to reasonable notice on dismissal; or if the school board, without notice, insist upon his instantly giving up the school and ceasing to discharge his duties, that he shall have compensation equivalent to what he would have received had reasonable notice been given.

It does not follow that because an engagement is terminable "at pleasure" that either party may terminate it without notice to the other. On the contrary, I think that wherever an office or employment is in itself of a permanent nature—that is, implying endurance or continuance for a considerable period of time—reasonable notice must be given by either party desirous of terminating it. The notice may be long or short, according to circumstances; but even a labourer, hired by the day is entitled at least to notice the previous day of his intended discharge. This seems not only in accordance with equity but to be absolutely necessary in most cases for the convenience or safety of both parties, and the rule is illustrated by many familiar cases. Thus, in the general hiring of domestic servants, where they are not hired for a fixed term, a month's notice or warning, or a month's wages in lieu thereof, seems to be the invariable practice recognised by decisions.[1] Even where the engagement is from term to term reasonable notice must be given before each term arrives, otherwise the engagement will be held renewed by tacit relocation for another term or another year.

There seems no reason why this rule should not apply to the case of a schoolmaster holding his office during pleasure. Undoubtedly the office is of a permanent nature,—that is, it contemplates an endurance for some considerable time. The schoolmaster is in possession of a dwelling-house and garden. He and his family cannot be required to give up possession of these without being allowed reasonable time to provide themselves with accommodation elsewhere. The arrangements of the school, and the management and regulation of the classes, have a certain permanence which cannot, without great injury and inconvenience, be interrupted without notice or preparation, and the teacher cannot provide himself with another school without reasonable, and, it may be, without some considerable delay.

Nor is the teacher the only party interested in insisting for reasonable notice. The school board also have perhaps as strong an interest in the same direction. The rights of the teacher, and those of the board, are corresponding and correlative. The utmost mischief might be done if the teacher, any morning, without notice, were entitled to desert his post,—and without providing a substitute, or giving any opportunity for doing so, leave his school untaught, and allow the whole pupils to be perhaps permanently scattered,—and yet this would be the result if the contention maintained by the Abernethy School Board is well founded; for if the board are not bound to give reasonable notice to the teacher, it would be impossible to hold that the teacher was bound to give reasonable notice to them. Both parties must be bound in this matter or neither, unless, of course, in the case of some very special and specific bargain.

Tenancy at will, or mere precarious possession of land, affords another instance of the necessity of reasonable notice to quit, and such notice must be longer or shorter, according to the nature of the subject possessed, and the mode of its use or cultivation.

The only other question is, what is reasonable notice? and on this point, and looking to the whole circumstances in which a schoolmaster, such as the present pursuer is placed, I agree with the majority of your Lordships that three months' notice, or three months' salary in lieu of notice, is a reasonable and suitable arrangement.

---

[1] Cutter v. Powell, 6 Pr. 326; Robinson v. Hindman, 3 Esp. 235, 2 Selwyn, N. P. 1032, S. C.; Archard v. Horner, 3 C. and P. 349; Fawcett v. Cash, 5 B. and Ad. 904; Beeston v. Collyer, 4 Bing. 309.

No. 150.

July 3, 1876.
Morrison v. Abernethy School Board.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—As I agree with the majority of your Lordships I did not intend to add anything to the exhaustive statement of Lord Deas. But in consequence of some observations which have been made I wish to add a few remarks.

I do not deny that the question is a difficult one; indeed the difference of opinion upon the bench shews its difficulty. But upon one matter I have no difficulty. If the question were, which of the two opinions is most in accordance with the spirit of the Education Act, and with the objects of the persons who promoted it, and who have the interests of education at heart, I have no hesitation in giving the preference to the result at which the majority of your Lordships have arrived. It will give stability to the position of school boards, and will remove difficulties in their path, by inducing men of ability to accept the office of schoolmaster. Lord Neaves has anticipated serious evils from our judgment. Not long ago similar vaticinations were uttered from the bench in regard to what would happen if any future generation should allow parish schoolmasters to hold their office on any other tenure than one ad vitam aut culpam. We have grown wiser since. I have no doubt that the present fears will meet with precisely the same fulfilment.

But with the policy of this statute we have no concern. The only question before us is, whether this action is well founded in principle, and if so, what is the principle on which it rests.

Lord Ormidale said that the grounds of action which we propose to sustain are not to be found in the summons. The summons is certainly a confused document, but what is concluded for is £50, as representing a quarter's salary and emoluments. There the pursuer pleads, no doubt alternatively, but quite distinctly,—"A school board dismissing a teacher without fault on his part is bound either to give reasonable notice, or pay corresponding compensation or damages." The question is, whether that is a sound plea. It seems to be thought that to sustain the plea is to question the tenure of the schoolmaster at the pleasure of the school board, and to go back to that tenure which the Legislature has abolished. So far from that being the ground on which I concur with the majority of your Lordships, my opinion proceeds on the opposite assumption, and is entirely founded on it. There is no doubt about the tenure. The only question is, what a tenure "at pleasure" implies. It is said that we cannot import the common law into the statute. From this I entirely dissent. The statute necessarily imports the common law by providing that the teacher shall hold office during the pleasure of the school board. We are compelled to resort to the common law to ascertain what are the incidents of a tenure at pleasure. I think that a tenure at pleasure, while it implies the right of the employer to dismiss the employed at any time without reason assigned lays upon him an obligation either to give reasonable notice or compensation in lieu of notice. It is not necessary to go into the principle of this rule, because it has been applied in so very many cases; but the rule is based on obvious equity. Our judgment will not allow a schoolmaster to retain his office one day longer than the board thinks fit; but it will secure to men offering their services as teachers to school boards that they will not be obliged to leave suddenly without compensation.

To remove all misapprehension, I may add that I have no idea that there was any gross fault on the part of this schoolmaster. I have no right to think that there was. All that we have before us is the fact that the school board have dismissed him without assigning a reason, as they were unquestionably entitled to do. No. 150.

July 3, 1876.
Morrison v. Abernethy School Board.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords of the Second Division having, along with three Judges of the First Division, heard counsel for the parties, in respect of the opinions of a majority of the Judges present, sustain the appeal, and recall the judgment of the Sheriff appealed against: Find that the respondents were entitled to dismiss the appellant from his office of head master of the public school of Abernethy at their pleasure, but were bound either to give him reasonable notice or to compensate him for the want of it: Find that three months' notice would, in the present case, have been reasonable, and that the sum of £50, as concluded for, is a proper amount of compensation: Therefore decern against the respondents for payment to the appellant of the said sum of £50, under deduction of £5 received by him to account thereof: Find the appellant entitled to expenses in both Courts," &c.

ROBERT MENZIES, S.S.C.—MURRAY, BEITH, & MURRAY, W.S.—Agents.

COUNT JOSEPH VALERY, Pursuer.—Balfour—J. P. B. Robertson. No. 151.
JOHN SCOTT, Defender.—D.-F. Watson—Trayner.

July 4, 1876.
Valery v. Scott.

Contract—Foreign—Locus Solutionis—Revenue Laws.—A Scotch firm of shipbuilders entered into a contract, executed in Paris, to build certain steam packets for a French firm. At the same time and place a member of the Scotch firm gave a letter to a member of the French firm engaging to pay him a certain percentage on the contract price.

In an action for payment of the commission the Scotchman pleaded in defence that the letter fell to be construed according to the law of France, and was void in respect that it was not duly stamped.

Held that the letter constituted a Scotch contract, and plea repelled.

Observations (per the Lord President) on contracts executed in foreign countries.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Rutherfurd-Clark. M.

THIS was an action by Count Joseph Valery, partner of the firm of Valery Freres et Fils, shipowners, Marseilles and Paris, against John Scott, partner of the firm of Scott and Company, shipowners, Greenock, for payment of £4864, and interest.

The pursuer averred;—"On 28th July 1870 the firm of Valery Freres et Fils, and the firm of Scott and Company, entered into and executed in duplicate in Paris a contract in the French language, whereby the firm of Scott and Company undertook to build for and supply to the firm of Valery Freres et Fils eight new iron screw packet boats." . . . (Cond. 3) "Simultaneously with entering into the said contract, the defender undertook and agreed to pay to the pursuer commission at the rate of two per cent upon the amount of the said contract, and at the same time with the execution of the said contract the defender wrote and signed and delivered to the pursuer a letter or obligation in the French language, of which the following is a copy and accurate translation:—'Paris, the 27 July 1870.—Monsieur Joseph Valery,—As has been agreed between us, I engage myself to give to you two per cent upon the amount of the contract for the eight new packet boats for which I have signed a contract to-day.—Yours truly, JOHN SCOTT.'"

He averred that the contract was executed, and the price paid, and that the commission amounted to the sum concluded for.

In answer to Cond. 3 the defender stated;—"The said letter is not duly stamped, and according to the law of France, where said letter was written and granted, it is essential that the said letter should be stamped in order to make it valid or binding as an obligation."

No. 151. July 4, 1876. Valery v. Scott.

He pleaded;—(1) The said letter falls to be considered and construed according to the law of France, where the same was made and granted, and by said law the said letter imposes no binding obligation upon the defender, but is null and void, in respect it is not duly stamped.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels the first plea in law stated for the defender, and appoints the cause to be put to the roll for further procedure." *

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—The constitution and validity of a contract was always governed by the lex loci contractus, and its interpretation was governed by the same law, unless it was plain that the parties had another place in view. It was only the remedy that was governed by the law of the place of performance.[1] The observations of the Judges in Stewart v. Gelot, with regard to revenue laws, were not borne out by the English cases. Contracts contrary to the revenue laws of a foreign country were not rejected as matter of evidence, but the revenue laws were recognised if they affected the constitution of the contract.[2]

The pursuer argued;—The locus contractus, in legal meaning, was not always the place where the contract was made—the locus actus. It might be the locus solutionis.[3] It would always be so, if that was apparently the intention of the parties, and that was so in the present case, where the contract was simultaneous with and relative to a purely Scotch contract for supplying steamships. (2) Even if Paris were the locus contractus the revenue laws of a foreign country were not binding.[4]

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am of opinion that this is a Scotch contract. We have heard a great deal on the one side about the place of making a contract, and a great deal on the other of the place of performing a contract. These are both circumstances to be taken into consideration as regards the nationality of a contract, but the place of performance is generally of more importance than the place of making.

The place of the making of a contract is in many cases indifferent. Take the case of two Scotchmen meeting in Paris, who contract regarding the disposal of a moveable in Scotland. It is of no consequence that they happen both to be in Paris. I merely put this as an example of how unimportant the place of making a contract often is. But the place of performance of a contract is never unimportant, for parties must always see that the law of the place where the

* "NOTE.—The contract, though made in France, was to be performed in Scotland, where the defender was domiciled. Hence any question raised as to its validity is, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, to be determined by the law of Scotland—See Story's Conflict of Laws, sec. 280."

[1] Ersk. Inst. iii. 2, 39; Lord Brougham in Warrender v. Warrender, Sept. 1835, 9 Bligh, N. R. 110; Story, Conflict of Laws, 282; Lawrence's Wheaton's Internat. Law, 179; Cooper v. Earl of Waldegrave, Feb. 14, 1840, 2 Beav. 282; Albion Insurance Co. v. Mills, June 27, 1828, 3 W. and S. 218; 3 Burge's Com. 758.

[2] Alves v. Hodgson, May 17, 1797, 7 Durnford and East, 241; Bristow v. Sequeville, May 7, 1850, 5 W. H. and G. 275.

[3] Story, Conflict of Laws, 280; Stewart v. Gelot, July 19, 1871, 9 Macph. 1057, 43 Scot. Jur. 583; Royal Bank of Scotland v. Scott, Jan. 20, 1813, F. C.

[4] Stewart v. Gelot, supra; Clements v. Macaulay, March 16, 1866, 4 Macph. 583; James v. Catherwood, June 3, 1823, 3 Dowl. and Ryl. 190; Wynne v. Jackson, July 25, 1826, 2 Russel, Ch. Ca. 351.

No. 151.
July 4, 1876.
Valery v. Scott.

contract is to be performed must affect them very much. Now, I think this is a Scotch contract to all intents and purposes. One of the contracting parties is a Frenchman, but that makes no difference; he might just as well have been a German. The party who undertakes the obligation, who is to perform the contract, is a Scotchman, whose place of business is in Scotland, and this obligation is in direct connection with another contract, viz., that of building the steamers, and the measure of liability under this contract can only be found by means of reference to that other. Now, that other contract is for building ships in Greenock, and by reference it is incorporated with this. Scott is only to be found at Greenock; the domicile, the residence, and the place of business of Scott are all Scotch. No place is contemplated in the contract except Greenock.

A good deal of misunderstanding has arisen from the way in which writers have treated this subject. By the term locus contractus is sometimes understood the place of making the contract, i.e., the place where it is actually made out and signed; but, in general, what is meant is the locality, as ascertained from the nature of the contract itself, and what is to be done under it. In this sense the civil law says, contraxisse unusquisque in eo loco intelligitur, in quo ut solveret, se obligavit; that means, that the place of the contract is the place of performance. No doubt there are cases where the place of contracting is of importance, but generally the place of performing is of more. Here there is no room for serious argument on that point. Nothing here is French except the fact that the contracting parties happened to be in Paris. Of course the idea of a Scotch contract requiring a French stamp to make it binding is out of the question, and so I think the judgment of the Lord Ordinary should be affirmed.

D XLIV ^ tit 7. l. 2

I have also to add, that the passage in Erskine (iii. 2, 39–40) lays down a very important doctrine as regards the solemnities of deeds. A deed executed abroad may be good and valid here if made (1) according to the forms prescribed by our own statutes, or (2) according to the forms of the country where the deed is executed. But it does not follow that a deed falling under the second category is a foreign deed. It may be a Scotch deed, and the two cases referred to by Erskine are merely cases where the deeds were allowed to be held as if made in proper Scotch form, because they happened to have been executed in a foreign country. And I may mention that the doctrine there laid down was very fully considered in the case of Purvis, March 23, 1861, 23 D. 813, 33 Scot. Jur. 404, ~~D. 44, tit. 7, l. 21.~~

LORD DEAS.—The view of this case first presented to us was that this contract having been made in Paris was by the revenue laws of France not only inadmissible in evidence but actually void. That is not well averred in the record, for the only mention of it is in Ans. 3, which says,—"The said letter is not duly stamped, and according to the law of France, where said letter was written and granted, it is essential that the said letter should be stamped in order to make it valid or binding as an obligation." Now, foreign law is a matter of fact, and ought to be distinctly averred as such, and I think the record would have required to have been amended before that matter could have been gone into. It was a plausible argument, however, that by the law of the place where the contract was made it was null, and the plausibility was strengthened by the conflicting opinions of Judges and jurists which were cited to us. I was at one time disposed to allow inquiry, before answer, as to whether the contract was really null by the law of France. But so soon as the defender, in place of accepting that view, which would have left all farther questions open, insisted upon joining issue on the merits, and called upon us to decide that the contract was a French contract, it was evident he had no chance of success. Probably he had been advised that an objection under the stamp laws does not create an absolute and insuperable nullity in France any more than it does in this kingdom. It really does not matter, however, for if the contract was good according to the law of the place of performance, that is enough; and as it is good by that law, I am for giving it effect accordingly. I may also say, that my judgment would have been the same if this contract had stood by itself, without being connected with the other contract.

No. 151. July 4, 1876. Valery v. Scott.

LORD ARDMILLAN concurred.

LORD MURE.—I have come to the same conclusion. If this question had depended upon the obligatory letter alone, without any reference to the contract entered into between the parties for the building of ships at Greenock, I should have had some hesitation, having regard to the passages in Erskine, iii., 2, 40, in pronouncing this to be a Scotch contract. But this letter, as I read it, is indissolubly connected with the other contract; and looking to the fact that they were both signed on the same day, and that the one refers to the other, I think that the letter must be dealt with as a Scotch contract.

THE COURT adhered.

MASON & SMITH, S.S.C.—WRIGHT & JOHNSTON, L.A.—Agents.

No. 152. July 4, 1876. British Shipowners' Co. (Limited) v. Grimond.

THE BRITISH SHIPOWNERS' COMPANY (Limited), Pursuers and Respondents. —Jameson.

J. AND A. D. GRIMOND, Defenders and Appellants.—D.-F. Watson—Asher.

Ship—Carriage of Goods—Delivery—Risk.—In an action for payment of the freight of part of a cargo of jute shipped for delivery "at the port of Dundee" the consignee alleged in defence that the shipowners had failed to implement their contract by delivering the goods in good condition, and stated a counter claim of damages on account of certain bales which had been injured by rain water while lying on the quay, where they had been deposited. The consignee led evidence to shew that by the custom of the port the bales were checked by the shipping clerk only when placed on the consignee's carts for removal, and contended that till that time no delivery had taken place. Held that the defender had failed to instruct any custom of the port at variance with the general rule according to which delivery of each bale was complete as soon as it passed over the ship's side into the hands of the harbour porters employed for the consignee, and, accordingly, that the shipowners were not liable for the damage in question.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Forfarshire. M.

~~(Supra, p. 604.)~~ Dele

This was an action raised in July 1875 in the Sheriff Court at Dundee, at the instance of the British Shipowners' Company (Limited) against J. and A. D. Grimond, merchants and manufacturers, Dundee, for £95, 2s. 2d., being the balance of the freight payable by the defenders to the pursuers for the carriage of 750 bales of jute from Calcutta to Dundee, in the pursuer's ship "British Princess," in the spring of 1875, under bills of lading, by which the jute was to be delivered "in the like good order and well conditioned," as shipped, "at the port of Dundee," "unto order or assigns" of James Duffus, and which bills of lading were endorsed to the defenders.

No. 152.
July 4, 1876.
British Shipowners' Co. (Limited) v. Grimond.

The defenders admitted the delivery of part of the jute, and their liability for the freight thereof, but alleged (Stat. 2)—"The pursuers failed to perform the obligation incumbent on them by the said bills of lading, and as carriers by sea, inasmuch as they did not take due care of and give due delivery at the port of Dundee of ninety-one bales or thereby of the said parcels of jute. The pursuers, or others for whom they were and are responsible, unduly and improperly discharged said ninety-one bales in wet weather, and deposited the same on the open quay among wet mud, and unprotected, whereby the jute was injured by rain water."

The defenders accordingly set forth a counter claim of damages for loss on the ninety-one bales.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The pursuers having failed to implement their contract under said bills of lading, and the defenders having sustained damage through the fault of the pursuers, or their servants, or others for whom they are responsible, are entitled to set off such damage against the freight, and they accordingly plead compensation.

A proof was allowed, which established the following facts:—The practice in regard to the delivery of jute cargoes at the port of Dundee was that after due notice to the various consignees of the ship's readiness to discharge, the bales, as they came out of the ship, were deposited on the quay, from which the consignees removed them in carts without delay. It was the custom to discharge the ship by "lumpers" in the pay of the shipowner, who brought the bales to the deck, from whence they were generally run down a plank on to the quay, where they were taken possession of by the harbour porters, whom the consignee was obliged by the harbour regulations to employ for this purpose, and who were paid by him.

The "British Princess," on arriving at Dundee in the beginning of June 1875, was berthed by the harbour-master at a quay where there was no shed accommodation. The discharge of the cargo, which consisted of upwards of 8000 bales of jute, consigned to four different firms, began on 5th June. By the evening of 10th June (Thursday) the defenders had removed 320 bales of the jute consigned to them. About forty more bales of the defenders' jute which had been landed that afternoon were lying on the quay not removed. The defenders' clerk was at the quay the next morning (Friday), but he did not have the bales removed; in consequence of instructions from his employers not to send up a load of bales composed of different marks, and there was not in the lot which he found lying on the quay a sufficient number of bales of any one mark to make up a load (five bales). About noon that day (Friday, 11th June) a thunderstorm, accompanied by heavy rain, came on, and the forty bales above mentioned, along with thirty or forty others, also forming part of the defenders' jute, which had been landed that morning, were exposed to the wet, and damaged by the rain water. A few more of the defenders' bales were, notwithstanding the remonstrances of their clerk, landed during the storm, or, at least, while the quay was still wet and dirty, and were also damaged. The whole of the damaged bales, ninety-one in number, were allowed to remain on the quay till 18th June, when the defenders removed them to their warehouse, and subsequently procured a judicial inspection.

Evidence was led for the defenders to prove a custom of the port (not alleged on record) that in the case of jute cargoes the number of bales was not checked by the ship's and consignee's clerks until they were placed in the carts, in lots of five, for removal, and the defenders argued that delivery did not take place until the number of bales was checked.

The Sheriff-substitute (Cheyne) pronounced an interlocutor in which

No. 152.

July 4, 1876.
British Shipowners' Co. (Limited) v. Grimond.

he found "that the pursuers are not liable for the damage sustained as aforesaid by the goods landed on the Thursday evening in respect of the undue delay on defenders' part in removing them from the quay, but that they are liable for the damage done to the goods landed on the Friday by the rain of that day," assessed the damages at £25, to that extent sustained the defences, and found the defenders entitled to modified expenses.*

Both parties having appealed, the Sheriff (Maitland Heriot) altered his Substitute's interlocutor to the effect of finding that the pursuers were not liable for the damage sustained by the goods landed on the Friday morning before the rain came on, leaving them only liable for the damage done to the goods landed during the storm, which he assessed at £5, 7s., decerned against the defenders for the balance, £89, 15s. 2d., and found the pursuers entitled to expenses, subject to a deduction of one-sixth of the taxed amount.†

---

* "NOTE.—. . . . The pursuers' agent very properly conceded at the recent discussion that his clients were liable in damages so far as the bales (from fifteen to twenty probably) landed on the Friday afternoon were concerned, in respect that they landed them during rain, or at least placed them upon the wet quay without protecting them from the wet by putting sawdust or planks below them; but he contended that their responsibility extended no further, and he rested this contention upon the broad ground that the moment the bales were placed on the quay they were under the control, and therefore at the risk of the consignees. It was argued, on the other hand, on behalf of the defenders, that until placed on the carts the goods were in the possession of the carriers, and that the latter must be held responsible for the damage done to the whole parcel by the shower, inasmuch as the whole parcel was still in their custody when the shower came on, and though the shower was the act of God, still but for their neglect of ordinary precautions no damage would have resulted. After full consideration the Sheriff-substitute has found himself unable to adopt either of these contradictory views. It seems to him that the true view as to the mutual obligations of parties under the practice which prevails here in regard to the landing of jute cargoes from what was really a general ship (and it need hardly be remarked that in such a matter the practice of the port governs—see Abbott on Shipping, p. 334, 11th ed.) is that the shipowners are not discharged by merely putting the goods over the side, but are bound to take charge of them for a reasonable time after they are landed (for it would be unreasonable to expect that the consignees should keep carts constantly in attendance waiting for their goods to come out), but that, on the other hand, if the consignees fail to remove their goods with due and reasonable despatch, they and not the shipowners must stand the consequences of such a casus fortuitus as occurred here, the question what is due and reasonable despatch being of course a jury question depending on the circumstances of each case." The Sheriff-substitute then proceeded to apply the principle laid down, with the result stated in his interlocutor.

† "NOTE.—. . . . . The question for consideration in such circumstances is, who is responsible for the damage done to the jute while on the quay during the Friday storm? This seems to the Sheriff to depend on another question, viz., at what precise period did delivery of the bales take place?

"The pursuers, on the one hand, contend that delivery took place as soon as—all connection between the ship and the bales being removed—they were put into the hands of the harbour porters. The defenders, on the other hand, contend that delivery did not take place until the bales, having been lifted from the quay, were placed in their carts. The Sheriff-substitute again has adopted a medium between these two periods, and considers that the defenders are entitled to a reasonable time after they have been placed on the quay to have them removed, and he has held accordingly that the pursuers are not liable for damage to the lot landed on Thursday afternoon, in respect that the defenders had had a reasonable time for their removal, and had not availed themselves of it, but

No. 152.

July 4, 1876.
British Shipowners' Co. (Limited) v. Grimond.

The defenders appealed.

Argued for them;—Apart from any question of fault, the pursuers were liable for the damage caused by the rain on the Friday, in respect that delivery of the goods then lying on the quay was not then complete. Where the shipmaster, as here, came under a contract to deliver goods to a particular person at a particular place, he did not fulfil his contract by merely intimating to the consignee that the ship had arrived, and then, that the pursuers are liable for the damage to the lot landed on Friday forenoon, in respect that the defenders had not had such reasonable time.

---

"The Sheriff has carefully considered these three views, and is of opinion that the contention of the pursuers is the correct one. Such a ship is discharged by men called 'lumpers,' who are in the pay of the shipowners. These men bring the bales to the deck, whence they are generally 'run' down a plank on to the quay. At the bottom of this plank they are taken possession of by the harbour porters, who are in the pay of the merchant. The Sheriff is of opinion that as soon as each bale, after having been put over the ship's side on to the quay by means of a plank, or otherwise, is taken possession of by the harbour porters, it has been duly delivered to the merchants.

"These harbour porters are paid by the merchants, and in this question they must be reckoned their servants. Then this delivery to the harbour porters takes place in the presence of the merchant's clerk, who is either present or ought to be present during the course of delivery. The goods, after being disposed of by these porters, are 'under the dominion and control' of the merchants. (See Judge Willes in Meyerstein v. Barber, 24th Nov. 1866, L. R. 2 C. P. 38, 50.) The bales are placed by the porters at such part of the quay as the merchant's clerk directs. After having been handed over to the porters it is the merchants and not the shipowners who provide carts for the removal of the bales. It is the merchants or their clerks who have to determine how long the goods are to remain on the quay. . . . .

"The Sheriff concurs with the Sheriff-substitute in opinion that the pursuers are not liable in damages in respect of the bales landed on Thursday afternoon. The Sheriff, however, goes further, and holds that the pursuers are not liable in damages either in respect of the bales landed on the Friday forenoon. He arrives at this result on the ground that both lots had been duly delivered to the defenders, that after such delivery the pursuers had over them no further control, but that they lay on the quay as long as the defenders wished, at the defenders' own risk. It seems to have been decided in the case of Bannatyne, 15th Nov. 1814, F.C., as stated in Bell's Com. 2, 97, that lien existed over wood launched from the hold of a vessel on to a raft fastened to the ship's side only until the raft was finished and the connection with the ship cut away. In like manner, in this case, at the time when the storm came on, all connection between the ship and the bales had ceased. While the pursuers had lost all lien or other control over the delivered bales, they had also, as it seems to the Sheriff, lost all responsibility connected with them.

"It is no doubt true that the various clerks do not take a note of the bales in their respective books until they have been placed in the carts in lots of five for removal. This is what creates any difficulty that may exist in the case; but, on the whole, the Sheriff cannot regard that fact as determining the punctum temporis of delivery. The goods are large, and cannot be carried off, and it is easier for the clerks to note the goods after having been classified and arranged into lots of five all with the same mark; but that period of making their entries seems to the Sheriff, to be adopted for the mere convenience of the clerks, and not as affecting the question of delivery. Before the goods are so noted they have been, as Judge Willes expressed it, 'under the dominion and control of the merchants.' These very bales were not placed on the defenders' carts until the 18th of June, and would not be noted in the clerks' books until that day, but it can scarcely be contended that delivery had not taken place before that date. If so, delivery and the marking in the clerks' book are not identical."

No. 152.
July 4, 1876.
British Shipowners' Co. (Limited) v. Grimond.

whether the consignee was there or not, putting the goods over the ship's side on to the quay. He must, in general, actually deliver the goods to the consignee or his servants. No doubt the consignee might be absent through no fault of the shipmaster; in that case the consignee would be liable to the shipmaster in any expenses incurred by him in warehousing or otherwise taking care of the goods, and the shipmaster would have a lien over the goods until such expenses were paid. Further, there was evidence to shew that according to the practice of the port of Dundee delivery of jute was not held to be complete until the bales were put upon the cart of the consignee. It was not till then that the number of bales was checked. If a bale was missing, clearly the ship would have to make it good, which shewed that the risk was still with the ship.[1]

The pursuers supported the judgment of the Sheriff.[2]

At advising,—

Lord Justice-Clerk.—The question of delivery is as much one of common sense as of technical rules. The general rule is that goods are delivered when they are so completely in the custody of the consignee that he may do as he pleases with them. In the present case, in the absence of any custom to the contrary, the goods must be held to have been delivered as soon as they were put over the ship's side and in the hands of the harbour porters, who were paid by the merchant. I do not say that where there is an obligation to deliver at a particular port, and where there are certain well defined rules uniformly and consistently acted upon at that port, compliance with the rules may not be a condition of delivery. If it had been alleged and proved that it is a uniform practice at the port of Dundee that before the consignee is entitled to take away any goods he is obliged to go through the form of checking the goods with the ship's clerk, this would have had an important bearing on the question of delivery. But I have come to be of opinion that the proof does not bring the practice up to this point, and that the carrier was discharged of his duty, and relinquished any lien over the goods when the goods were put over the ship's side.

Independently of this, I think that the defenders are not entitled to raise the question. They had no right to leave the goods on the quay for a week, and then, when it became impossible to separate the damage, to bring this claim.

Reserving entire the question as to the effect of the custom of the port, which does not, I think, arise in this case, and which, if it does arise, the defenders are barred from pleading, I am of opinion that we should adhere to the judgment of the Sheriff.

Lord Neaves and Lord Ormidale concurred.

Lord Gifford.—I entirely concur in the judgment of the Sheriff-principal, and very much on the grounds stated by him in his note. The whole damage done to these bales seems to have arisen from this,—that at the place where the vessel was discharging the jute in the harbour of Dundee there was not sufficient shed accommodation. The ship was ordered to a berth where there happened to be no shed. This is a matter as to which the merchant must take his chance,

[1] Abbott on Shipping, 11th ed., p. 334; Gatliffe v. Bourne, 4 Bing, N. C. 314; Addison on Contracts (ed. 1875), p. 481; Story on Bailments, 577, 545.

[2] Bell's Com. (M'L.'s ed.) vol. i. p. 605, and vol. ii. p. 97; Parsons on Shipping, vol. i. p. 152, cited with approval by Dr Lushington in "The Norway," 1865, 12 Law Times (N. S.), p. 61; Meyerstein v. Barber, Nov. 24, 1866, L. R., 2 C. P. 38 (Justice Willes, p. 50).

No. 152.
July 4, 1876.
British Shipowners' Co. (Limited) v. Grimond.

and for which the shipowner is in no way responsible. The shipmaster was bound to discharge upon the open and exposed quay, for there was no other place for him at the harbour to which he had been ordered.

There is no question in this case about due notice having been given to the consignee of the arrival of the ship. The discharge had regularly begun some days before the Thursday when the first parcel of jute said to be damaged left the ship. The ship was in the course of discharging, all in due order. The merchant was there by his clerks and by the shore porters, who were receiving each bale as it was taken out of the ship, and all was going smoothly. If the consignee had not appeared at all a different duty would have been imposed on the shipmaster. He would have had to warehouse the goods for the consignee's behoof. But no case of this kind arises, for the consignee was on the spot all ready to receive his goods as they came out of the ship, and, accordingly, there is no question as to the jute discharged prior to the Thursday in question.

Now, as to the Thursday's discharge, I agree with the Sheriff that there is no sufficient evidence that the goods which were put out on that Thursday were improperly put out, and I think the only real question relates to the jute which was put out on Friday morning. I agree with the Sheriff that the punctum temporis when delivery of each bale took place (if it is necessary to determine this), is the moment when each bale passes over the ship's side, and sliding down the plank or swinging from the crane is there taken possession of and received by the harbour porters who, I hold, are acting for the consignee, and who are there for the very purpose of receiving each bale. No doubt there might be questions if the merchant is not there to receive his goods, in which case it may be the duty of the shipmaster to warehouse or otherwise take care of the goods. But the consignee in the present case got notice of the arrival of the ship, and he was in the course of receiving the goods. He was there by his clerk and by the shore porters, who in a question of this kind must be regarded as his servants. No doubt he must employ the shore porters, who have a monopoly of this duty, but still they are the consignee's servants, and he pays them, and the necessity of employing them and not other parties is a mere harbour arrangement. The moment the goods come into the hands of these porters, that is delivery in law, unless a custom is established to the contrary. Now, I am clearly of opinion that no contrary custom is established. No usage has been proved inconsistent with complete delivery taking place at the moment I have indicated. I do not think that it follows from what has been proved in regard to checking—which seems very much a matter of arrangement for the convenience of the merchants—that delivery is suspended till such checking takes place. There is no evidence whatever that the charge of the goods on the quay, or any expense connected with them, is laid upon the shipmaster—no proof that the risk of the goods until they are checked lies with the ship. In the present case the consignees did not choose to send for the bales as they came out of the ship. For their own convenience they allowed the bales to lie on the quay while they arranged them for convenience of forwarding to customers into parcels bearing the same mark, there being, it seems, sixteen different marks in the same consignment. Surely the ship had nothing to do with that.

In order to prove a custom adverse to the general rule it would be necessary to shew that it is the practice for the ship to provide tarpaulins to cover the goods while they lie on the quay before being checked, and that if goods are injured before being checked the ship is obliged to pay, and actually is in use to pay, for the damage. In the absence of such evidence, I agree with the Sheriff that we must apply the ordinary rule.

No. 152.
July 4, 1876.
British Shipowners' Co. (Limited) v. Grimond.

Another consideration which points to the same result is the difficulty of finding any other punctum temporis as the time of delivery. The Sheriff-substitute does not say that the time of checking is the moment of delivery. He puts it at a reasonable time after the goods are put out of the ship. This would be a very inconvenient test to apply, very vague and uncertain, and constantly varying in each particular case. It is very desirable that the point of delivery and the fact of delivery should be precise, definite, and easily ascertained, and in the absence of all evidence to the contrary I think the criterion adopted by the Sheriff is the true one.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced :—"Find that the goods discharged from the vessel on Thursday the 10th and Friday the 11th of June libelled were delivered to the defenders on those days respectively: Find that no reason has been established by the defenders that should have prevented the pursuers from discharging the goods from the vessel on those days: Therefore dismiss the appeal; affirm the judgment of the Sheriff appealed from: Find the appellants liable to the respondents in the expenses of the appeal," &c.

PETER DOUGLAS, L.A.—MACARA & CLARK, W.S.—Agents.

No. 153.
July 5, 1876.
Dudgeon v. Thomson and Donaldson.

RICHARD DUDGEON, Complainer.—D.-F. Watson—Hunter.
WILLIAM THOMSON AND BENJAMIN DONALDSON, Respondents.—Supra p 604—Asher—Jameson.

Process—Jury Trial—Proof—Breach of Interdict.—The holder of a patent having obtained an interdict against B infringing the same subsequently presented a petition and complaint against B, and C, his partner, for breach of interdict. Held that the case should be tried before the Lord Ordinary without a jury.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Rutherfurd-Clark. B.

RICHARD DUDGEON, who held a patent for improvements in apparatus used in expanding boiler tubes, and had obtained an interdict against William Thomson infringing the same, presented, with consent of the Lord Advocate, a petition and complaint to the First Division against William Thomson, and Benjamin Donaldson, whom Thomson had assumed as partner.

The respondents in their answers denied that any breach of interdict had been committed. The respondent Donaldson further maintained that as the interdict had no application to him personally he could not be guilty of breach of interdict.

After hearing counsel in the Summar Roll, the cause was remitted to Lord Rutherfurd-Clark (Ordinary) in terms of the Act of Sederunt 11th July 1828, sec. 86.

The Lord Ordinary thereafter closed the record, and pronounced an interlocutor on 14th June assigning a diet for the adjustment of issues.

Against that interlocutor the complainer reclaimed, with leave of the Lord Ordinary.

He argued that in a case of breach of interdict a jury trial was unusual.[1]

[1] Mackenzie v. Mags. of Dingwall, Feb. 12, 1839, 1 D. 487, 11 Scot. Jur. 319; Gray v. Petrie, Feb. 17, 1848, and March 10, 1849, 10 D. 718, and 11 D. 1021; Menzies v. Macdonald, Feb. 13, 1864, 2 Macph. 652, 36 Scot. Jur. 321; M'Neill v. Scott, March 17, 1866, 4 Macph. 608, 38 Scot. Jur. 316; Act 6 Geo. IV. cap. 120 (Judicature Act, 1825), sec. 28; Act 29 and 30 Vict. cap. 112 (Evidence Act, 1852), sec. 4.

No. 153.
July 5, 1876.
Dudgeon v. Thomson and Donaldson.

The respondents argued;—The case was fitted for jury trial (1) as being of a quasi-criminal nature; and (2) because the question of Donaldson's liability was one which a jury could best decide.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am against a petition and complaint for breach of interdict being tried by a jury, for the very reasons which have been mentioned in support of that view by the counsel for the respondents. The first is, that it will come out in the course of the trial that this is a case of a quasi-penal character. If so, it is unsuited for a jury, for the mind of the jury might be prejudiced thereby. That is one reason; and the other is, that there may be a difficult question raised as to the liability of the defender Donaldson as a partner of Thomson, and the question will be, not whether Donaldson has infringed the patent so much as whether he is so involved as to have committed a contempt of Court. That is a question which is particularly well suited for the decision of the Court without the assistance of a jury.

LORD DEAS.—There is no doubt that breach of interdict involves a contempt of Court. We could hardly send this case to a jury without submitting to them the question whether a contempt of Court has been committed. That is a question which it is our duty to decide for ourselves.

LORD ARDMILLAN and LORD MURE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to appoint the cause to be tried before himself without a jury, reserving all questions of expenses."

D. CARSON, S.S.C.—AULD & MACDONALD, W.S.—Agents.

No. 154.
July 5, 1876.
Presbytery of Deer v. Heritors of Pitsligo.

THE PRESBYTERY OF DEER, Pursuers.—Asher—Darling.
THE HERITORS OF PITSLIGO, Defenders.—D.-F. Watson—Jameson.

Church—Manse—Presbytery—Expenses—Ecclesiastical Buildings Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 96), secs. 3 and 4.—A minister petitioned the presbytery to visit his manse with a view to repairs. The presbytery employed an architect, and pronounced findings in accordance with his report. The heritors appealed to the Sheriff under sec. 3 of the the Ecclesiastical Buildings Act, 1868, which enacts that an appeal "shall have the effect of staying the presbytery from taking any further steps in connection with" the proceedings, and the case was ultimately disposed of on further appeal to the Lord Ordinary on Teinds. The presbytery did not appear in the appeal, but decerned against the heritors for the amount of their architect's account, and, not receiving payment, raised an action for payment of the account, as duly incurred by them. Held that they were entitled to decree.

Observed—That the presbytery ought not to have pronounced decree for their expenses after the case had been appealed to the Sheriff.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Shand. B.

THE minister of Pitsligo presented a petition to the Presbytery of Deer praying for an inspection of his manse with a view to its repair. The presbytery, after due intimation, visited the manse, and employed Mr Rhind, architect, to report, and afterwards pronounced a finding in terms of his report. The heritors, who had been represented by agents during these proceedings, appealed to the Sheriff under the Ecclesiastical Buildings Act (31 and 32 Vict. c. 96), sec. 3. The case was further carried by appeal before the Lord Ordinary on Teinds, who, on a report by another architect, ordered certain operations to be made upon the manse, declared it to be free, and found the minister entitled to modified expenses.

No. 154.

July 5, 1876. Presbytery of Deer v. Heritors of Pitsligo.

The presbytery did not appear in the appeal.

Mr Rhind having presented his account, the presbytery allocated the amount, together with a small sum of other expenses, in all £62, 4s. 8d., among the heritors according to their valued rent, and decerned against them. The heritors having refused to pay, the presbytery raised this action against them for payment of the amount in their several proportions.

The pursuers pleaded;—(2) The account sued for having been duly incurred by the Presbytery in connection with the manse of Pitsligo, and the heritors of the parish of Pitsligo being liable for the same, the pursuers are entitled to obtain decree as concluded for. (4) The heritors of the parish of Pitsligo being liable for all sums duly incurred in connection with the repairs and alterations necessary for putting the manse in a habitable condition, and the sums sued for having been duly incurred in that connection, the defenders are bound to make payment thereof in the proportions specified.

The defenders pleaded;—(4) Under the Ecclesiastical Buildings and Glebes (Scotland) Act, 1868, it was incompetent for the presbytery to take any steps in connection with the process regarding the repair of Pitsligo manse, or to pronounce any decerniture thereanent, after the cause had been appealed to the Sheriff, and the findings and decrees of the presbytery founded on by the pursuer are inept.* (5) The process regarding the repair of Pitsligo manse having been finally disposed of in the Court of Session, and the defenders having paid the whole expenses for which they were found liable in said process, no further liability can attach to them for expenses alleged to have been incurred in said process.

The Lord Ordinary, on 11th January 1876, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having considered the cause, in respect of the defenders' fourth plea in law supersedes consideration of the cause, in hoc statu, to allow the pursuers an opportunity of appearing in the process of appeal mentioned on record, to the effect of claiming the expenses now sued for." †

His Lordship afterwards refused a motion to recall the sist, and granted leave to reclaim.

---

* See section 3, quoted in the Lord Ordinary's note.

† "NOTE.—. . . The defenders maintain that the present proceeding by a separate action in the Court of Session for expenses incurred by the presbytery in the general application to them is incompetent, and that the course which the pursuers ought to adopt is to compear in the process of appeal. It appears to me this view is sound. The statute, section 3, provides that an appeal 'shall have the effect of staying the presbytery from taking any further steps in connection with said proceedings;' i.e., inter alia, the proceedings before any presbytery relating to the repair of a manse. This provision, and the whole scope of the statute, seems to shew that it was the purpose of the Legislature that after an appeal taken all farther orders or decrees should be granted in the process of appeal only.

"In the argument the defenders have not maintained that all remedy is excluded, but only that they should not be exposed to the expense of a second process in the supreme Court. The clerk of the presbytery was cited as a respondent in the original appeal, but did not appear, apparently because the question at issue was really between the minister and the heritors. But if the presbytery, acting within their functions, competently employed Mr Rhind, and are entitled to relief, they were entitled to appear, and seem to me to be still entitled to appear, in the process of appeal, to be heard on their claim for the expenses incurred. I have thought it better merely to supersede consideration of the cause in the meantime, and not to dismiss it until it shall be seen whether the other mode of procedure is held competent, or conceded to be open to the pursuers in the proper process."

No. 154.
July 5, 1876.
Presbytery of Deer v. Heritors of Pitsligo.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—These expenses were incurred by the presbytery in the exercise of their duty, and the heritors were liable for them.[1] The presbytery were not parties to the appeal, and were not bound to sist themselves.

Argued for the defenders;—The action was incompetent, because it was really a claim by separate action for expenses of process, which ought to have been claimed, if at all, in the principal process.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In November 1871 the minister of Pitsligo presented a petition to the presbytery praying for an inspection of the manse with a view to its repair. The presbytery considered the petition, and resolved to take the assistance of Mr Rhind, architect. They accordingly remitted to him to inspect the manse. He furnished a report, and afterwards a supplementary report, in terms of which the presbytery pronounced a finding. The proceedings were then removed from the presbytery to the Sheriff by an appeal taken by the heritors under the 3d section of the recent Ecclesiastical Buildings Act.

Now, if this appeal had not been taken, and the case had remained in the presbytery, or if the case had occurred before the recent statute, I cannot doubt that whatever the ultimate result of the case as between the minister and the heritors might have been the expenses incurred by the presbytery in employing an architect to advise them would have been expenses which they were entitled to charge against the heritors, and they could have proceeded under the old law to give decree against them in the proportions in which they were severally liable.

The relations of the heritors and the presbytery in a matter of this kind are peculiar. The heritors are bound to maintain the ecclesiastical buildings. The presbytery are the guardians and conservators of the benefice, and it is their office to see that all parties connected with the parish do their duty, and they may give orders to any one who is not doing his duty. They have control over the minister, over the church officers, and also over the heritors, in regard to their obligation to uphold the ecclesiastical buildings.

When a complaint was made that the manse was out of repair it was the duty of the presbytery to inform their minds on that subject, and if they required the advice of an expert they were entitled and bound to take it, and according to immemorial usage they were entitled to do so at the expense of the heritors. If the case had gone no further, and the parties had been agreed that the repairs were to be executed in accordance with Mr Rhind's report, there could not have been a doubt on the point; and to say that because the minister and the heritors differed on the report the presbytery are to pay the expenses out of their own pockets would be quite inconsistent with practice and authority.

The only question is whether anything has occurred to alter the result since the heritors appealed under the 3d and 4th sections. The effect of the appeal was to stay all further procedure in the presbytery, and transfer the cause to the Sheriff, and when the presbytery went on to allocate the expenses they had incurred, and give decree for them, they were doing what, in my opinion, they had no right to do. But that does not affect the present question. The case was appealed from the Sheriff to the Lord Ordinary on Teinds. The two parties litigant, the minister and heritors, maintained their respective views, and in the end the judgment was not in favour of either out and out. The Lord Ordinary dealt with the expenses in accordance with that judgment, finding the minister entitled to expenses subject to modification. Now, it is to be observed that during the whole of this procedure the presbytery were not parties, and could not be. The moment the case was removed out of their hands they could not interfere either as a Court or a party litigant. That being so, the question is whether they are to be prevented from recovering from the heritors the expenses which they would have been entitled to recover if the case had remained before them. I cannot see why they should be.

[1] Erak. ii. 10, 58, 63 (Ivory's Note, 306); Cook's Styles, 171.

No. 154.

July 5, 1876. Presbytery of Deer v. Heritors of Pitsligo.

It is said that these are part of the expenses of process, and that the rule is that expenses of process cannot be recovered in a separate action. I should be sorry to throw doubt on the universal application of that rule. But in a question between the presbytery and the heritors these are not the expenses of any process whatever. It is a sum due by the heritors to the presbytery because of the necessity of the presbytery calling in an expert to advise them in an important step of public duty. It is a debt fairly incurred, and I see no good ground of defence to the action.

LORD DEAS, LORD ARDMILLAN, and LORD MURE concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the said interlocutors: Repel the defences, and decern against the defenders for payment to the pursuer, the Reverend John Mitchell, as representing the Presbytery of Deer, of the sum of £62, 4s. 8d., and that in the proportions mentioned in the conclusions of the summons: Find the defenders liable in expenses," &c.

ALEXANDER MORISON, S.S.C.—STUART & CHEYNE, W.S.—Agents.

No. 155.

July 5, 1876. Robertson v. Adamson.

WILLIAM ROBERTSON, Pursuer.—Rhind.
ALEXANDER ADAMSON, Defender.—Mair.

Municipal Election—35 and 36 Vict., cap. 33 (Ballot Act, 1872), secs. 2 and 28—Voter's Mark.—Held (by a majority of seven Judges, diss. Lord Deas) that, in an election under the Ballot Act, 1872, a single stroke marked by a voter opposite the name of a candidate on a ballot paper was not equivalent to a cross as required by the Act, and was a mark by which the voter might be identified.

Municipal Election—35 and 36 Vict., cap. 33 (Ballot Act, 1872), secs. 2 and 28—Voter's Mark.—Held (1), in accordance with the decision in Haswell v. Stewart, May 23, 1874, ante, vol. i. 925, that crosses on a ballot paper to the right-hand side of the candidates' names, but not within the spaces marked off for them, were in compliance with the provisions of the Ballot Act; (2), in accordance with the same decision, that crosses to the left-hand side of the candidates' names were not in compliance with the provisions of the Ballot Act; (3) that certain marks in the proper spaces, which, though not crosses, involved the use of more than a single stroke, were sufficiently in compliance with the Ballot Act, and were admissible.

2D DIVISION, with three consulted Judges. Ld. Craighill. R.

IN November 1875 there were four vacancies in the town-council of the royal burgh of Musselburgh, and seven candidates were nominated for these vacancies. After a poll had been taken, in accordance with the provisions of the Ballot Act, 1872, William Brown, the senior bailie of the burgh, who officiated as returning officer, declared four of the candidates duly elected. William Robertson, the defeated candidate who had the largest number of votes, thereupon raised an action of reduction and declarator against Mr Brown, as returning officer, and the other members of the town-council, concluding to have the election of the two successful candidates with the smallest number of votes annulled and set aside, and himself declared duly elected a member of the town-council of Musselburgh.

The grounds upon which the action was based were objections to the rulings of the returning-officer as to the rejection of ballot papers as not properly marked. Of these there were five classes, viz.:—1. Twenty-three ballot papers with the crosses on the right-hand side of the candidates' names, but not within the spaces marked off for them on the paper; 2. Ten ballot papers with the crosses on the left-hand side of the candidates' names; 3. A ballot paper (No. 327) with the following marks in the spaces containing the candidates' names, and on the right-hand side—

4	MACKINLAY (John Mackinlay, Blucher Hall, Musselburgh, Brick Manufacturer.)
5	ROBERTSON (William Roberston, High Street, Musselburgh, Grocer and Baker.)
6	SMART (Charles Smart, High Street, Fisherrow, Lathsplitter.)
7	WILKIE (Alexander Wilkie, Hope Park, Levenhall, Residenter.)

4. A ballot paper (No. 479) with the following marks in the proper spaces opposite the candidates' names—

3	LAURIE (George Laurie, 38 Bridge Street, Musselburgh, Surgeon.)
4	MACKINLAY (John Mackinlay, Blucher Hall, Musselburgh, Brick Manufacturer.)
5	ROBERTSON William Robertson, High Street, Musselburgh, Grocer and Baker.)
6	SMART (Charles Smart, High Street, Fisherrow, Lathsplitter.)
7	WILKIE (Alexander Wilkie, Hope Park, Levenhall, Residenter.)

No. 155.
July 5, 1876.
Robertson v. Adamson.

5. A ballot paper (No. 415) with the following marks in the proper spaces opposite the candidates' names—

2	DICKSON (Robert Dickson, High Street, Musselburgh, Grocer.)	1
3	LAURIE (George Laurie, 38 Bridge Street, Musselburgh, Surgeon.)	1
4	MACKINLAY (John Mackinlay, Blucher Hall, Musselburgh, Brick Manufacturer.)
5	ROBERTSON (William Robertson, High Street, Musselburgh, Grocer and Baker.)	1
6	SMART (Charles Smart, High Street, Fisherrow, Lathsplitter.)
7	WILKIE (Alexander Wilkie, Hope Park, Levenhall, Residenter.)	1

And two ballot papers (Nos. 434 and 388) with merely single strokes or short straight lines in the proper spaces opposite the candidates' names.

These papers had all been rejected by the returning officer, and the pursuer maintained that if they had been counted he would have had more votes than one, at least, of the successful candidates.

The two candidates whose election was impugned, Messrs Adamson and Laurie, lodged defences, and contended that the returning officer's ruling was correct.

On 22d February the Lord Ordinary, in respect of a joint minute, assoilzied the defender Laurie.

A record was made up with Adamson, the remaining defender, and on 2d March 1876 the Lord Ordinary reported the cause to the Second Division.*

* "NOTE.—The present action has been raised for the purpose of setting aside the election of the defenders, George Laurie and Alexander Adamson, or one or other of them, as councillors of the burgh of Musselburgh, and of having it found that the pursuer ought to have been returned as one of the elected councillors on the occasion of the last election, which occurred on the 2d November 1875. The result depended upon a scrutiny. The ballot papers having been produced and examined, the pursuer became satisfied that the challenge of Mr

No. 155.
July 5, 1876.
Robertson v. Adamson.

On 9th March the Second Division appointed the cause to be heard before themselves with three Judges of the First Division. The cause was heard on 5th June, when the argument was restricted to the admissibility of the papers in the 5th class (Nos. 434 and 388), which were marked by single strokes only.

Argued for the pursuer;—According to the most recent decision in England under the Ballot Act,[1] any indication of the voter's intention was held to be sufficient compliance with the provisions of the statute, provided there was no appearance of previous concert on the face of the paper. This case had been approved by the Parliamentary Committee on the Ballot Act.[2] The Wigtown Burghs case[3] had been commented upon as having taken too strict a view of the provisions of the statute. There was nothing in the body of the statute rendering a cross necessary. It was only in the directions to voters annexed to the Act that a cross was mentioned. These were only suggestions, not imperative instructions which had to be complied with to the letter.[4]

Argued for the defender;—The instructions to voters were part of the statute, and imperative. They must be complied with. In Haswell v. Stewart[5] the Court had been unanimous against votes by single straight strokes.

On 3d July the cause was advised on this point as follows:—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—But for the recent judgment in the case of Woodward v. Sarsons in the English Court of Common Pleas we should probably not Laurie's election was groundless, and the latter accordingly, with the consent of the pursuer, has been assoilzied.

---

"But the litigation between the pursuer and Mr Adamson is still maintained; and the question whether the latter was duly elected, or whether the pursuer ought not to have been returned, depends on the validity or invalidity of the votes, as evidenced by the ballot papers, to which parties on the one side and on the other take exception. The questions which have been raised seem to be—(1) Whether the cross or mark, when placed on the left-hand side of the ballot paper, is, in the sense of the Ballot Act, a mark by which the elector has marked his vote? (2) Whether marks, which are not in the form of a cross, and obviously were not intended to be in the form of a cross, are sufficient? and (3) Whether marks not in the form of a cross, and obviously not intended to resemble or to be parts of a cross, are things written or marked on the ballot papers by which the voters can be identified, and therefore are things by which the ballot papers whereon they appear are rendered void?

"Upon two of these questions, at any rate, the Second Division of the Court of Session gave judgment in the case of Haswell v. Stewart (Wigtown Burghs Election), May 23, 1874, 1 Rettie, p. 925. But since that case was decided the case of Woodward v. Sarsons, Law Rep. (10 C. P.), p. 733, has been decided by the Court of Common Pleas in England; and the two decisions, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, cannot be reconciled. In these circumstances, he considers it better to report the present case, that it may be decided at once by the Inner-House. The adoption of this course, it may be added, is likely to conduce to the saving of time, which, in a case like the present, is a material consideration. The parties therefore were not only willing, but anxious, that the case should be reported."

[1] Woodward v. Sarsons, July 9, 1875, L. R. 10 C. P. 733, 44 L. J., C. P. 293 (Ballot papers lithographed there).

[2] Blue Book, April 6, 1876.

[3] Haswell v. Stewart, May 23, 1874, ante, vol. i. 925.

[4] 35 and 36 Vict. cap. 33, secs. 2 and 28, schedule 1, rule 36.

[5] Supra, note 3.

No. 155. July 5, 1876. Robertson v. Adamson.

have requested your Lordships of the First Division to aid in the decision of the present question, but should, as matter of course, have followed the direct precedent of the previous judgment of the Second Division in the case of Haswell v. Stewart. But we thought it right, out of respect to the judgment in the English Court, as well as regard to the inexpediency of having a conflict of decisions in the two parts of the island on such a matter, to have the question raised in this case deliberately reconsidered. I took no part in the previous judgment, and I have now very attentively studied the unquestionably grave and authoritative exposition of the views of the English Judges in Woodward's case; but I have formed an opinion that, notwithstanding the difficulties attending the subject, the former decision of this Court was right, and should be followed in the present action.

The only question with which I mean to deal in delivering my opinion is that to which the case was ultimately narrowed, namely, whether five ballot papers which were tendered at the municipal election at Musselburgh in November 1875 for one of the candidates were invalid by reason of their being marked by a straight line and not by a cross as directed by the Ballot Act.

The provisions of the Act which appear to be material are the following:—(Reads secs. 2, 13, 28; schedule 1, rules 22, 25, 36). It is argued that these provisions are directory only, and not imperative; and that therefore substantial and not implicit compliance with them is all that is required. I do not differ from this as a general proposition, for in regulating the practical exercise of the popular right of election there must of necessity be many things directed in which it would be inexpedient and mischievous to exact literal obedience to the mere words of the direction when the substance and intent of the provision have been fulfilled. But in considering whether the directions of the schedules, which form part of the statutory enactment, have been substantially followed, regard must be had to the nature and scope of the specific direction, and to the object of the statute in exacting it. Some of these provisions, such as the mere forms of the writs to be used, the election writ itself, the direction, the certificate and indorsement, the notice of election, and the nomination paper, even the form of the ballot paper, and such like, being matters purely of form, are to be as nearly in the forms given in the schedule as circumstances will permit. But the directions given to the elector and to the returning officer as to what he is to do, or what he is not to do, are of a different class, and some of them, at least, in order to be substantially, must be implicitly followed, especially in those matters which are prohibited. Thus, for example, it is provided that nothing is to be printed on the ballot paper, excepting in accordance with the schedule, and, again, that the voter is not to vote for more than the proper number of candidates, and the returning officer is to reject voting papers which present certain appearances. These and other similar enactments are injunctions and prohibitions which must be as specifically complied with as if they had been specially provided in the body of the statute.

The objections which have been taken to the voting papers before us are two. The first is, that the voter has not, as directed by the schedule, placed a cross opposite the name of the candidate for whom he voted, and has therefore not indicated, in terms of the statute, the person for whom he intended to vote. The second is, that, even if he have indicated for whom he meant to vote, he has placed a mark on the paper by which he may be afterwards identified, which is expressly prohibited by the injunctions in the schedule.

No. 155.
July 5, 1876.
Robertson v. Adamson.

If the only object of the direction given to the voter to place a cross opposite the name of the candidate for whom he votes (which is expressed in imperative terms), had been to ascertain for whom he intended to vote, the provision would have been construed favourably for the voter, and any mark which sufficiently indicated his intention might have been sufficient. Apart from the direction of the statute one could have had no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the straight lines in the voting papers before us were meant to indicate, and do indicate, for whom the elector intended to vote. But we must take this direction along with the prohibition which follows, for if a mark which is not that prescribed in the statute be a mark by which the voter may be afterwards identified, it follows that the object of providing a special mark, and enjoining its use, was not only to enable the voter to indicate for whom he voted, but, by prescribing uniformity in such marks, to prevent the secrecy of the vote from being violated. In regard to this most vital prohibition it seems clear, first, that it is not necessary in order to bring a mark placed on the ballot paper within the scope of the prohibition that it should disclose the identity of the voter on the face of it. Such a provision would have been futile, for nothing but a signature and designation would have that effect. Even a signature by itself would not do so, as there might be other electors of the same name, and identification by handwriting requires extrinsic evidence. If, in addition to the cross required, the elector places a numeral or a letter in the corner of his paper, that of itself would, in my opinion, be sufficient to violate the prohibition, although, without inquiry, no one could tell who the voter was who had so marked his paper.

It must be remembered that this is not an enfranchising statute; it is an Act to regulate, and, in some measure to restrict, for great public objects, the way in which an existing franchise is to be exercised, and while we are not to read these restrictions in a narrow and vexatious spirit we are bound to construe them so as to accomplish the object in view. That object was to secure the secrecy of the elector's vote, to enable him for his own benefit to vote in secret, so as to free him from molestation or undue pressure in the exercise of his right; and, for the benefit of the other electors and of the public, to oblige him to vote in secret, in order to prevent his using his vote corruptly. It is for that reason that he is prohibited from putting any mark on the voting paper by which he may be afterwards identified.

In the second place, the only question which seems contemplated by the direction is, whether, on the inspection of the ballot paper, it bears a mark by which the voter may be afterwards identified. It is here that, with the greatest respect, I chiefly differ from the learned Judges in the case of Woodward. They say that the prohibition means that the voter is not to vote "so as to make it possible, by seeing the paper itself, or by reference to other available facts, to identify the way in which he has voted,"—that is to say, that if he cannot be identified by seeing the paper itself, and if no other facts are available, it is immaterial what marks appear on the paper.

I find no such qualification in the words of the statute, nor do I think it harmonises with the reason of the prohibition. The statute does not appear to me to contemplate that the presiding officer shall refer to any facts excepting those which he finds in the paper itself. He is to look at it, and if he finds (1) that it is without the official mark, or (2) that the voter has voted for more candidates than he should, or (3) that it has a mark on it by which the voter can (or may) be identified, or (4) that it is uncertain, he is then and there to reject the vote. With the intent or object of these things, save what the paper discloses, he has, and can have, no concern. In regard to marks, he is to decide merely on their character, and if he finds that they are such as can or may lead to the voter being afterwards identified, he is to reject the vote, and if he does not so find, on inspection of the paper, he is to admit the vote. Whether the mark would, in point of fact, enable him to identify the voter, is of no consequence, and he can have no means of knowing. A committee of the House of Commons, or a Court of justice, might inquire for months into the identity of the voter and not discover it; and yet all the time the mark on the paper may have disclosed it to the only person to whom the facts were available, and for whose information it was placed there.

No. 155. July 5, 1876. Robertson v. Adamson.

To hold that before this prohibition is to receive effect there must be proof, either absolute or prima facie, of the intent with which the paper was so marked, would be to nullify altogether a provision which seems vital to the operation of the statute. The direction is not designed against the public notoriety of the voter's identity, but against those occult and concealed arrangements which might so easily frustrate the design of the Ballot Act,—such devices, in short, as, while the identity of the voter is concealed from the public, may lead to its being disclosed to a confederate—a confederate, it may be, who has paid the voter for his vote, and wishes to be assured that he has received value for his money, or one who has unduly used the influence of his position to compel the voter to take this way of informing him how he voted. A provision that these arrangements, when disclosed and proved, should nullify the vote, would have been entirely illusory; for the ballot was resorted to mainly because these secret and corrupt transactions could not be detected; and the provision I am now considering had, in my opinion, no other object but to baffle such practices by prohibiting absolutely, whatever the motive of the voter, marks which might aid in their perpetration.

It is this view which gives importance to the present case, but if it is well founded, it follows that the only mark which the voter is permitted to place on his voting paper is the simple and easy, but uniform one, of a cross, and that the direction to this effect is imperative. In cases in which it is plain, from inspecting the paper, that the voter had attempted, although ineffectually or imperfectly, to follow the direction of the statute, such misadventure should not invalidate his vote; but in the present case the paper discloses an intention not to follow the directions of the statute, but to substitute a different mark for that directed. I am of opinion that this is such a mark as may lead to the voter being afterwards identified, and that, therefore, the voting paper is invalid, and I am glad to find that in coming to that conclusion I not only concur with the views of Lord Neaves and Lord Ormidale in the Wigtown case, but with those of Lord Benholme also, for, while the latter differed in regard to some of the votes which were rejected by the majority, he concurred in thinking that a voter who had placed a straight line opposite the name of the candidate had not thereby indicated for whom he intended to vote in terms of the statute.

Lord Deas.—The desire of your Lordship to confine the argument and the opinions in this case to a single point places me in some perplexity. I should have liked to have heard a full argument upon all the points in connection with each other, and particularly as to the effect attributed to a two-legged stroke and a one-legged stroke, or, in other words, the difference between a straight stroke and an angular, or what has been said to be a double stroke. But as yet I have been unable to find any substantial difference between the two.

I have no doubt that the instructions in the schedule annexed to the Act are directory merely, but that does not solve the present case, because, even though directory, they must be substantially complied with. The difficulty is, what is substantial compliance?

The construction of the Act was very fully discussed and considered in the Wigtown Burghs case in this Division of the Court, and in the English case of Woodward v. Sarsons. In the imperfect shape in which the matter is now placed before us I shall not resume the consideration of it at any length, but shall content myself with saying that I have come to the same conclusion with that which was come to in the English case of Woodward. I do not, of course, regard that decision as a precedent which we are bound to follow; but I adopt the reasons judicially assigned for it, which are much more satisfactory to my mind than those on the other side.

LORD NEAVES.—I concur in the view of your Lordship in the chair that we must dispose of the point which at the discussion was said to be the test of the case. Whether it may afterwards appear not to be the turning point I do not anticipate. Our judgment falls now to be given on the point raised in argument and taken to avizandum.

I take it, the best example of the point to be decided is on the ballot paper No. 434, where we have on the right-hand side of the candidate's name a straight stroke.

The effect of directions in such a statute as this requires to be carefully considered. It is impossible to say that they are there for nothing. We must, indeed, allow for such deviations as ignorant men might make, and so must construe these directions with some latitude. On the other hand, this is an important Act, contrived to secure the freedom of voters from interference before or after an election by those who have influence over them. Whatever we may say as to strictness to be observed in enforcing these directions we cannot say that they are not part of the Act. They are expressly made so.

A cross is enjoined to be made, and the question before us is whether a line, such as we have here, is or is not a cross in compliance with the statute. I should have great difficulty in saying that it was in compliance with the statute. I cannot imagine that a man who votes at either a parliamentary or a municipal election does not know what a cross is. It is unquestionably made up of two lines. What can have been the meaning of the man who, being enjoined to make a cross, and knowing what a cross is, makes only a straight line? He may never have meant to make a cross at all—he may never have meant to vote at all, but only to appear to vote. He may have been driven to the poll, and have been obliged to appear to vote, and yet never intended to vote, but wished to evade the duty. A man who is presumably capable of making a cross and makes a line must either have forgotten what he had to do, or must have wilfully abstained from doing it. The vote is not a complete one. What is required for that purpose is no act of calligraphy, but merely to make what is the simplest and best known sign all over the world. Where that is not made there is no enixa voluntas to complete the vote.

No. 155. July 5, 1876. Robertson v. Adamson.

Such a deviation may also come under another part of the statute which provides against any mark by which a voter may be identified. The provision does not bear "can be" or "is," but "may be." One can quite understand that such a system of marking as there is here might have been prearranged. It is an unnecessary and inexcusable deviation from the statute, and an inexplicable one, unless as a means of enabling some one to indentify the voter.

I think the purpose of the statute would be defeated in a matter of essential importance if we sustained these papers. I adhere to my opinion in the Wigtown case, and think generally that the marking of such a line is only explainable in two ways, either that the voter did not intend to vote at all, or that he made this mark to shew some one that he had voted according to a prearranged plan.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—It appears to me that in the present position of this case, as placed before us, we have nothing else to decide except what is the effect on the validity of the vote when a straight line is put on the ballot paper in place of a cross. I concur with your Lordship that it was quite understood in the discussion that if we decided that point the whole matter would be settled. If it will not have that effect we may regret but cannot help it. In the meantime we must decide the point before us.

I concur with your Lordship that this not an enfranchising statute; it is a procedure Act. The object is to protect voters from undue influence, and the mode adopted is to secure secrecy of voting.

The Act lays down rules for voting, partly in the body of the Act itself, and partly in schedules. The distinction is a just one, that what is in the body of the Act is absolutely imperative, while what is in the schedules may be directory only. In this case I do not think that the schedules are absolutely imperative. I cannot say that no deviations, however trifling, can be permitted. Where, for instance, a person has tried to make a cross according to the best of his ability, I do not say that a slight slip in making the cross will render the vote bad. But where he makes a figure, or a mark, which is most emphatically not a cross, the result is different. Besides, where a person makes a mark different from a cross, whereby he may be identified, the vote is bad. The object of the statute is that every mark should be a cross,—that all the marks should be as nearly alike as possible,—so that no single paper can be so identified as to trace the voter.

Here, instead of a cross, a line has been made, plainly not in the attempt to make a cross, but quite a different mark. This might have been a mark made by arrangement,—agreed on between the voter and a confederate, and intended to promote discovery of the vote, if that should be desired, contrary to the principle of the statute. This would defeat the secrecy which the Act was intended to secure.

I therefore concur in the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk that we should sustain the objection, so far as it regards these voting papers marked with a single stroke or line. I indicate no opinion as to the value of the marks more nearly resembling a cross, and more likely to have been made with the intent of forming a cross.

I am satisfied that these marks before us, with a line or stroke, are not even an attempt to fulfil the directions of the statute.

No. 155.
July 5, 1876.
Robertson v. Adamson.

LORD ORMIDALE.—In this action the pursuer concludes for a reduction of the election of the defenders Adamson and Laurie as town-councillors of the burgh of Musselburgh, on the ground that according to the true meaning and effect of the Ballot Act, 1872, he had a majority of votes over both, or at any rate over one of them. The case having been given up as against Laurie, it now depends between the pursuer and the other defender Adamson.

No objection has been taken to the competency or form of the action; and indeed there is no other form of action provided by statute or otherwise, so far as I am aware, in relation to a municipal election in Scotland which could have been adopted by the pursuer.

The question to be determined is one of importance and interest, and all the more considering the conflicting judgments on the points upon which it turns of this Court in the Wigtown Burghs Parliamentary Election case, Haswell v. Stewart, vol. i. 4th series of Court of Session Cases, 925, and of the Court of Common Pleas in the Birmingham Municipal Election case, Woodward v. Sarsons, July 9, 1875, Law Reports, Com. Pleas, vol. x. p. 733. In consequence of this conflict I have very carefully examined the grounds upon which the two Courts have proceeded, and although I was one of the majority of the Court by which the Wigtown case was decided I need scarcely say that I should, if satisfied I was then wrong, have had no hesitation in now deciding differently.

In the Wigtown case this Court held that according to the sound construction of the Ballot Act it is obligatory on a voter to mark the ballot paper with a cross to the right of the candidate's name for whom he intends to vote, while in the Birmingham Municipal Election case it was held by the Court of Common Pleas that this was not obligatory, but merely directory, and that it was sufficient if the voter indicated the candidate for whom he intended to vote by a mark, whether a cross or not, on the front or face of the ballot paper. Again, while it was decided by this Court that any substantive writing or mark by the voter other than a cross,—making allowance for what might reasonably be held the various ways in which different persons, from age or otherwise, might make such a mark on the ballot paper,—would invalidate it, the Court of Common Pleas held that other marks, whatever might be their form, made by the voter on the ballot paper, would not void the vote, provided it was not marked so as to shew that he intended to vote for more candidates that he was entitled to vote for, or so as to leave it uncertain whether he intended to vote at all, or for which candidate he intended to vote.

Such is, stated generally, the difference betwixt the decisions of this Court and the Court of Common Pleas in regard to the marking of ballot papers by voters. But another and a very important difference—one indeed upon which the question which of them is right very much, if not entirely, depends—arises in regard to the true interpretation and effect of that part of section 2d of the Ballot Act, which enacts that the ballot paper on "which anything except the number on the back is written or marked by which the voter can be identified shall be void and not counted." It was held by this Court that according to the sound construction of this enactment it was enough to invalidate the vote that the mark other than a cross in some reasonable form is of a description whereby the voter might be identified, not that he shall be identified, which of course could only be done by a separate proof or investigation, in which a great deal of evidence on the one side and the other might be necessary to be gone into; while, according to the contention of the pursuer, the Court of Common

No. 155.
July 5, 1876.
Robertson v. Adamson.

Pleas held that such proof or investigation was indispensable, and must be gone into, and be found sufficient to identify the voter. Whether this is the construction put upon the Act by the Court of Common Pleas does not appear to me to be clear; and that it is a sound construction I am not prepared to admit. As to this matter I shall afterwards have some observations to make.

But let us see what is the nature of the ballot papers which the pursuer says were improperly rejected in the municipal election at Musselburgh, and which, if counted, would have resulted in his election in place of the defender Adamson. There are numerous ballot papers having marks upon them of various descriptions other than a cross, and on parts of the paper other than to the right of the candidate's name intended to be voted for—all as set out and exhibited by the state in the appendix to the closed record. It is unnecessary at present to inquire whether all of these marks are of a character to invalidate the votes. We can only at present deal with the papers having a straight line, thus | on them in place of a X to the right of the favoured candidate's name. That was the only matter which has as yet been argued at the bar; but how far that may be sufficient to determine the case may require consideration afterwards. The result, however, at which the Court may now arrive will not unlikely be of much service, if not conclusive, of any other point or points which may yet be raised.

According to the decision of this Court in the Wigtown case voting papers not having a cross on them at all, but merely a single straight line, are invalid, and have been properly rejected; while, according to the decision of the Court of Common Pleas in the Birmingham municipal case they are valid and ought to have been counted.

In considering the conflicting question which has thus arisen I think it is of much importance that it should be kept in view that the object of the Ballot Act is not to enfranchise or admit voters to the electoral roll, but to enable those who are already on the roll to give their votes in secrecy, and in that way to afford them what was thought to be a necessary protection in the exercise of the franchise. In this view, the Ballot Act ought, I think, to be construed so as its object may be accomplished as far as practicable. This, as it appears to me, for the reasons stated at length by the majority of the Court in the Wigtown case, may be done by a cross on the right-hand of the candidate's name intended to be voted for—a mark which, in the words of Lord Neaves, is "well devised for the purpose, easy of execution by men of the most moderate intelligence, and at the same time perfectly neutral in its character, so as to be practically incapable of betraying its authorship by its appearance." But if various other marks, quite different from a cross, or even one on the left, were, according to the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, admissible, it cannot, I think, be doubted that the identification of the voters might thereby be established, and the great object of the Ballot Act entirely defeated. For example, let it be supposed that by prearrangement an understanding has been come to between a candidate, or some party acting for him, and a number of the electors, that they should put upon their voting papers a mark different from a cross, or even a cross, but on the left-hand side in place of the right-hand side of the candidate's name, it is plain that the candidates, or their agents present, as they are entitled to be, at the counting of the votes, could easily see how the electors with whom the arrangement had been made voted, and whether they had, or had not, adhered to that arrangement. In this way the voters might be identified, and the protection intended to be afforded by the Ballot Act defeated. Nor do I see how it would be possible for any party, other than those participant in the improper arrangement, to know anything about it, so as to be able by the necessary evidence to expose and frustrate its object.

No. 155.
July 5, 1876.
Robertson v. Adamson.

I cannot help thinking, therefore, that the interpretation adopted by this Court in the Wigtown case, of clause 2d in the Ballot Act, to which I have referred, is the sound one. Nor am I able with certainty to discover from the report whether this may not have been also the view of the Court of Common Pleas in the Birmingham case, for while in some parts of the judgment in that case extrinsic evidence of the identification of voters would appear to have been desiderated, in other parts this would rather seem not to have been considered necessary. Thus, I find that two voting papers having the name of one of the candidates written upon them were held to be bad without any extrinsic evidence of the actual identification of the voter who so wrote on the papers, merely because it "might give too much facility by reason of the handwriting to identify the voter."

Without entering further into the matter, which is amply explained in the reports of the two conflicting decisions in question, I have merely to add that I continue to be of opinion that the rules of construction of the Ballot Act given effect to in the Wigtown Parliamentary Election case, although stricter than those adopted in the Birmingham Municipal Election case, are sound, and not too strict, and therefore ought to be adhered to.

LORD MURE.—The only question we have now to consider is whether a single straight line marked on a ballot paper at the place where the voter is directed to put a cross is a sufficient compliance with the statute? Taking the 28th section along with the directions in the schedule I am of opinion that it is not, and I entirely concur with the exposition of the statute which has been given by your Lordship in the chair. I do not think it necessary to repeat at length the grounds on which I have come to the same conclusion. Where an Act of Parliament enacts, as it does here, that a schedule thereto shall be construed and have effect as part of the Act, we are, I conceive, bound to read the schedule as embodied in the Act; and when a clause in an Act of Parliament says—"The voter . . . will place a cross on the right-hand side" (of a ballot paper of which the form is given) "opposite the name of each candidate for whom he votes,"—thus X, I am unable to hold that the Legislature intended that it should be sufficient to place a single straight line. If it had been intended that any such mark should be sufficient, it would have been easy to say "a cross, or other distinctive mark." That, however, has not been done; and I cannot give the words as they stand any such interpretation.

LORD GIFFORD.—If the purpose of the Ballot Act had been to confer an electoral franchise, or even to provide a convenient mode in which electors exercising the franchise should record their votes, I should have been disposed to hold that the directions as to filling up the voting papers were rather directory than imperative, and that if it fairly appeared upon the face of the ballot paper who the candidates were for whom the voter intended to vote I would be disposed to sustain the vote, even although the voter had to a considerable extent deviated from or failed to comply with the provisions or directions of the statute.

No. 155.
July 5, 1876.
Robertson v. Adamson.

But I cannot lay out of view that one of the principal objects of the statute, if not the leading end which it had in view, was to secure absolute secrecy in voting, so that it should not be known for which candidate or candidates any elector voted, and that this should not be discoverable from the voting papers either by the candidates or their agents, although necessarily for the purpose of checking the counting and otherwise the voting papers are open within certain limits to the scrutiny of those interested.

Now, in this point of view, I agree with the majority of your Lordships. I think that the directions for filling up the voting papers, so far as necessary to or conducive to secrecy of voting, are not merely directory, but really imperative, and therefore must be at least substantially observed. I agree that much in the statute may be directory, but wherever non-observance does or may destroy secrecy I think the case is different. If a variation is made in the mode of marking the votes of such a nature that it possibly, and by means of preconcerted arrangement may identify the voter to the candidates or their agents, I think this is enough to vitiate the vote, although there be no actual proof of such preconcerted arrangement. Thus, it is admitted on all hands that if the voter write his own name or initials, or even write the candidate's name, instead of marking a cross, the vote will be bad, and I think the same principle will apply to any other mark differing substantially and essentially from the cross required by the statute. I agree that if there be substantially a cross, or an obvious effort to make a cross, this will be enough, and the Court will always incline to sustain rather than to reject a vote in dubio; but I am of opinion that it is not too strict a reading of the statute to hold that the voter who refuses to make the statutory cross, but substitutes therefor a line, or a circle, or a square, or a triangle, or any other figure which may obviously be made the means of identification, loses his vote.

I concur, therefore, in the result reached by the majority of the Court that a mere straight stroke is not equivalent to the cross required by the statute.

> On 5th July this interlocutor was pronounced:—"In conformity with the opinion of a majority of the seven Judges, find that, in an election under the Ballot Act, the use of a straight line by the voter, thus |, on the ballot paper, is not equivalent to a cross as required by the said Act, and is a mark by which the voter can or may be identified."

The Second Division thereafter resumed consideration of the whole questions raised. The twenty-three ballot papers mentioned as class I., supra, were sustained. The ten ballot papers, class II. supra, were, in accordance with the decision in the Wigtown Burghs case,[1] rejected. The ballot paper, No. 327, class III., was sustained, as also was that, No. 479, class IV. In class V. the two papers, No. 434 and 388, bearing only strokes, were, in accordance with the finding of the majority of the seven Judges, rejected. With regard to No. 415, the remaining paper in this class, the following opinions were delivered:—

Lord Justice-Clerk.—In the case of this paper there is wanting that clear determination not to make a cross, which is obvious in the case of the other two papers which we have rejected. It is not necessary to go into any subtle questions. That broad distinction, I think, is sufficient.

[1] Haswell v. Stewart, May 23, 1874, ante, vol. i. p. 925.

No. 155.
July 5, 1876.
Robertson v. Adamson.

LORD NEAVES.—We have here, instead of a single stroke, two lines, which puts this paper in a different class from the other two. I think it should be sustained.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I will not differ from your Lordships. But I may observe that, although there are what may be called two strokes, I can discover no trace of an attempt to cross them. We must, however, make large allowances. In the Wigtown Burghs case Lord Neaves and I observed that large allowances should be made, and I think we should make such an allowance now.

LORD GIFFORD.—I am of the same opinion. Although this is not exactly a cross, still it is quite distinguishable from the marks which we have rejected.

The result of these findings was that Adamson remained in a majority of one.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"The Lords having resumed consideration of the cause with the classified state, No. 25 of process, and heard counsel upon applying the finding contained in the above interlocutor of this date, sustain the votes under class I. of the said state; reject the votes under class II.; sustain the vote under class III.; sustain the vote under class IV.; under class V. sustain the vote under ballot paper No. 415; reject the votes under ballot papers Nos. 434 and 388: Find that the result of applying these findings to the election in dispute is to leave the defender Adamson in a majority of one: Therefore sustain the defences for the defender Alexander Adamson, and assoilzie him from the whole conclusions of the summons, and find him entitled to expenses," &c.

LEGAT & SHIELD, W.S.—FERGUSON & JUNNER, W.S.—Agents.

No. 156.
July 6, 1876.
Young, &c. v. Nith Commissioners.

ROBERT YOUNG AND OTHERS, Pursuers.—D.-F. Watson—Alison.
THOMAS FERGUSSON SMITH AND OTHES (Commissioners of the Harbour of Dumfries and the Navigation of the River Nith), Defenders.—R. Johnstone—Mackintosh.

Expenses—Public Trust—Personal Liability for Expenses.—A body of statutory navigation commissioners unsuccessfully defended an action of damages for injury to a vessel caused by their operations on the channel of a river. The defenders themselves stated on record that the only source of income belonging to them were the rates which they were authorised to levy, and that the whole of these rates had been assigned in security of money borrowed, and were insufficient to pay the interest. The Court found the pursuers (the owners of the vessel) entitled to decree for expenses against the defenders qua commissioners, reserving all questions of personal liability in the event of the funds of the trust being insufficient to satisfy the decree for expenses.

2D DIVISION. Lord Shand. R.

THIS was an action by Robert Young and others, the owners of the steam-tug "Arabian," against Thomas Fergusson Smith, provost of Dumfries, and others, "Commissioners of the Harbour of Dumfries and the Navigation of the River Nith, acting under the statute 51 Geo. III., cap. cxlvii.," * and Thomas Anderson, their clerk.

The summons concluded for £200 of damages, in consequence of in-

* The statute is a local and personal Act, but declared to be public, to be judicially noticed.

No. 156.
July 6, 1876.
Young, &c. v. Nith Commissioners.

juries sustained by the "Arabian" having struck against a stone dyke, erected by the defenders in the channel of the river Nith, and covered at high water, which the defenders had failed to mark by a buoy or other mark to warn persons navigating the river of its existence.

The commissioners defended the action. They denied liability, on the ground, inter alia, that the accident was caused, as they averred, by the fault of those on board the "Arabian." They also stated that the rates and duties authorised to be levied by them formed their only source of income, and that the whole of these had been assigned, in virtue of powers conferred by their statute, in security of money borrowed, and were insufficient to pay the interest thereof.

The Lord Ordinary, after a proof, pronounced an interlocutor, finding that the stranding of the "Arabian" was caused by the fault of the defenders in having failed to have any mark on or in the neighbourhood of the dyke to warn navigators of its existence: "Therefore decerns against the defenders, Thomas Fergusson Smith, provost of the burgh of Dumfries, and others, as 'Commissioners of the Harbour of Dumfries and the Navigation of the River Nith,' under the statute mentioned in the summons, and Thomas B. Anderson, as their clerk, for the said sum of £150 sterling: Further, finds the defenders, as commissioners and clerk foresaid, and also the defenders, commissioners foresaid, personally liable in expenses, and remits," &c.

The defenders reclaimed.

Parties having been heard both on the merits and upon the personal decerniture for expenses against the defenders, the Court intimated that they concurred with the Lord Ordinary on the merits.

Argued for the defenders on the question of expenses;—Even testamentary trustees were not made personally liable in expenses if they litigated in bona fide.[1] A fortiori public trustees should not be subjected in personal liability. If they incurred such liability the result would be that no one would act on a public trust; and even if persons could be got to act, the trust would have to submit to any random claim brought against it, as the trustees would not be in safety to defend the action. The case of a trustee in a sequestration was exceptional. His personal liability rested on his duty to consult his constituents before embarking in litigation, whereas the defenders had no constituents to consult. This was the first instance, so far as it appeared from the reports, in which personal liability for expenses was sought to be attached to public trustees.

Argued for the pursuers;—By entering into the contract of litiscontestation the defenders must be held to have come under an obligation to make good the expenses of process if they proved unsuccessful. In most of the cases of testamentary trustees the question occurred with beneficiaries, and was whether trustees, who had litigated unsuccessfully, should be found personally liable in expenses, notwithstanding that there were trust-funds sufficient to meet the expenses. But this was a different question from whether, when there was a deficiency of trust-funds, the trustees were not bound to make good that deficiency. In such cases testamentary trustees had been made liable.[2] All that the pursuers asked was a decree against the defenders reserving their relief against the trust-funds. The absence of any direct authority on the subject was explained, first, by the fact that a public trust so impecunious as the present was

[1] Dickson v. Bonar's Trustees, Nov. 20, 1829, 8 S. 99, 2 Scot. Jur. 40; Kirkland v. Crighton, Feb. 3, 1842, 4 D. 613, 14 Scot. Jur. 239.

[2] Raeburn v. Dawson, June 14, 1831, 9 S. 728, 3 Scot. Jur. 493; Kay v. Wilson's Trustees, March 6, 1850, 12 D. 845, 22 Scot. Jur. 363.

No. 156.
July 6, 1876.
Young, &c. v. Nith Commissioners.

not often met with, and secondly, that after the decision of the House of Lords in Duncan v. Findlater, August 23, 1839,[1] until the recent case of Virtue v. Commissioners of Police of Alloa, Dec. 12, 1873,[2] a question like the present could not have arisen.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think that the portion of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor finding the defenders personally liable in expenses must be recalled. I am not prepared to say whether in certain circumstances a body of public trustees might not render themselves liable for the expenses of an action unsuccessfully maintained by them, nor to say what effect the knowledge that they had no funds might have on the question of liability. Perhaps there may be a distinction between actions brought by trustees and those in which they are called into Court. Here the claim against the defenders is directed against them qua commissioners, and accordingly the appropriate decree for expenses is, in the first instance at least, in the same terms as the decree for damages. I am disposed to reserve any question of personal liability for expenses in the event of the statutory funds proving insufficient.

LORD NEAVES, LORD ORMIDALE, and LORD GIFFORD concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Having heard counsel on the reclaiming note for the commissioners for the harbour of Dumfries, &c., against Lord Shand's interlocutor of 1st February 1876, adhere thereto on the merits: Recall the finding as to expenses: Find the pursuers entitled to expenses against the defenders qua commissioners, reserving all questions of personal liability in the event of the funds of the trust being insufficient to implement this decree: Remit to the Auditor to tax the expenses now found due," &c.

WEBSTER & WILL, S.S.C.—J. C. & A. STEUART, W.S.—Agents.

No. 157.
July 7, 1876.
Kirriemuir Police Commissioners v. Reid's Trustees.

THE COMMISSIONERS OF POLICE OF KIRRIEMUIR, Appellants.—D.-F. Watson—Kinnear—Harper.
DUNCAN WILKIE AND OTHERS (Reid's Trustees), Respondents.—Balfour—J. P. B. Robertson.

Police and Improvement Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 101), sec. 35.—In 1875 the burgh of Kirriemuir adopted the General Police Act of 1862, the 35th section of which provides that, if the Act is adopted, "any general or local Police Act within such burgh shall be repealed, excepting in so far as it may relate to matters not provided for in this Act." Held that the clause did not apply to provisions in the Forfarshire Roads Act, passed in 1874, imposing the burden of maintaining existing foot pavements of streets in the burgh upon the police commissioners.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Forfarshire.
M.

IN the burgh of Kirriemuir in Forfarshire, prior to 1874, the burden of maintaining footways in the streets was laid by the Police Act of 1833 upon the owners of property abutting thereon. By the Forfarshire Roads Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. c. cxlvii.), certain roads, including the High Street of Kirriemuir, were transferred from the road trustees to the police commissioners. By section 25 the burden of maintaining existing footways was laid upon the commissioners, and by section 27 certain powers

[1] 1 Rob. App. 911.

[2] Ante, vol. i., p. 285.

No. 157.

July 7, 1876. Kirriemuir Police Commissioners v. Reid's Trustees.

of assessment were given to raise money to be applied for this and certain other purposes specified, and for no other purposes.

In 1875 the burgh adopted the General Police Act of 1862. In October 1875 the police commissioners served an order on Reid's trustees, owners of property in the High Street of the burgh, in terms of the 149th clause of the General Police and Improvement Act, 1862,* requiring them to repair the footway in front of their property according to a specification.

Reid's trustees appealed to the Sheriff.

They averred that at the date of the passing of the Act of 1874 there was existing a footway of dressed flag pavement, and that the commissioners were levying the maximum rate of assessment authorised by that Act.

These averments were not disputed.

Reid's trustees maintained that they were exempt, under secs. 22 and 25 of the Forfarshire Roads Act,† and that the commissioners were bound to maintain the footways out of the rates.

The Sheriff-substitute (Robertson), and, on appeal, the Sheriff (Maitland Heriot), recalled and quashed the order.

The commissioners appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—The adoption in 1875 of the General Police Act of 1862 had the effect of repealing the Forfarshire Roads Act, 1874, in regard to all matters of police.

---

* 25 and 26 Vict., c. 101, sec. 149.—"The owners of all lands or premises fronting or abutting on any street shall, at their own expense, when required by the commissioners, cause footways before their property respectively on the sides of such street to be made, and to be well and sufficiently paved with flat hewn or other stones, or to be constructed in such other manner and form and of such breadth as the commissioners shall direct, and shall thereafter from time to time, as occasion may require, repair and uphold such footways."

† 37 and 38 Vict. c. cxlvii. sec. 22.—"The owners of all lands fronting or abutting on any road transferred to the commissioners of any burgh by or under the provisions of this Act shall, at their own expense, when required by such commissioners, cause footways to be constructed on the sides of such road in front of their respective properties, and to be well and sufficiently paved with flag-stones or other flat hewn stones, or to be constructed in such other manner and form and of such breadth as such commissioners shall direct, but subject to the following provisions, viz.—wherever, before the commencement of this Act, footways of dressed flag pavement have been constructed and are existing along any parts of the sides of any such roads, these footways shall exempt the owners of lands and heritages along which they are constructed, so far as the length of these footways extend, from all obligation to construct footways, or to alter the existing footways, but such commissioners may, in their own discretion, reconstruct or alter such existing footways as to them may appear expedient for the public interest, and defray the cost out of the moneys to be raised by them under this Act."

Sec. 25.—"Subject to the provisions of this Act as to the obligations of owners to construct footways, and as to the powers of the commissioners in relation to the construction of footways, the commissioners of each burgh shall manage and maintain the roads transferred to them by or under the provisions of this Act, and all footways of dressed flagged pavement, or other footways forming parts of such roads at the passing of this Act, or the date of such transference, . . . and shall keep such roads and footways at all times in a proper and sufficient state of repair, and the expense incurred by such commissioners in managing and maintaining such roads and footways shall be defrayed by them from and out of the monies to be raised and received by them under the authority of this Act."

At advising,— No. 157.

July 7, 1876. Kirriemuir Police Commissioners v. Reid's Trustees.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The respondents are the owners of property in the High Street of Kirriemuir. It is not disputed that the footway in front of their property was before these proceedings laid with dressed flag pavement, and had been in existence for some time. In particular it was in use before 1874. But on 27th October last the police commissioners served a notice on the respondents ordering them to relay the pavement. The notice sets out that it requires to be repaired and relaid, and there follows a specification of what is to be done. This order bears to proceed on the authority of the 149th clause of the General Police and Improvement Act, 1862, and it is not said to be otherwise than regular in point of form. But it is said by the respondents that the obligation to relay the footway is not regulated by that Act, but by the Forfarshire Roads Act, 1874, and particularly the 22d section.

The history of this matter is rather peculiar. The Forfarshire Roads Act proceeds on the plan of transferring from the statute-labour trustees of the county all roads within the boundaries of burghs to the commissioners of police of those burghs, and of course imposes on them the burden of maintenance. In 1874 the Police Act in force in Kirriemuir was the Act of 1833, and under it (section 105) footways were to be maintained and relaid at the expense of the owner. [The provision was almost in words the same as the 149th section of the Act of 1862]. But that was altered by the 22d and 25th sections of the Road Act of 1874, which throws the burden of maintaining existing pavements upon the commissioners.

Now, it is not contended that when that Act was passed the commissioners could have made the charge they have done, because the Act of 1874 being subsequent, and in terms applicable to the case, was the governing statute. But it seems that in 1875 the Police Act of 1862 was adopted, and the effect of that was to put an end to the Act of 1833, and to substitute the more recent Act. But it is said that it has done more,—that it has the effect of repealing the 22d section of the Forfarshire Roads Act. It rather appears to me that if the adoption of the Act of 1862 has any repealing effect quoad the Act of 1874, it must operate a repeal of it in toto, for I can find no words which justify the notion of partial repeal. The section founded on is the 35th, which provides that if the Act is adopted "any general or local police Act in operation within such burgh shall be repealed, excepting in so far as it may relate to matters not provided for in this Act." If the Road Act of 1874 comes within the meaning of these words, then for all police purposes that Act must stand repealed. But so far as the commissioners of police are concerned their interest in the Road Act is entirely in regard to police purposes, and it is not in their mouth to say that the Act is repealed, because they are levying under its authority an assessment for police purposes to the maximum amount of 6d. in the pound.

But perhaps it would not be right to say that any one is personally barred from having the true meaning of an Act of Parliament ascertained. So it is necessary to inquire whether the effect attributed to the 35th section of the Act of 1862 is really consistent with its meaning and object. Now, in the first place, I doubt whether the Act of 1874 is a local Police Act within the meaning of the clause. The object of the clause plainly was to say,—"If you adopt this new statute any general Act that you have previously adopted is repealed as regards your burgh, and any local Police Act which enabled you to manage your police without a general Act is also repealed." Now, their police matters were regulated by the general Act of 1833, but not by any local Act. Therefore the effect of the clause was to repeal, quoad Kirriemuir, the Act of 1833, and nothing more.

No. 157.

July 7, 1876.
Kirriemuir Police Commissioners v. Reid's Trustees.

Section 1 of the Act of 1862 provides that previous general Police Acts are repealed, except in those burghs where they have been adopted. In these the old Acts are not repealed by the mere passing of the Act of 1862. But then it is necessary that section 35 should be taken in connection with section 1. If these burghs go on to adopt the Act then the old Act is repealed.

But, secondly, while I am of opinion that the Act of 1874 is not a local Police Act, if it could be so described, I should say it was impossible to hold that it is repealed by the 35th clause, because it was plainly intended to be a permanent Act affecting the burgh, whatever may be the Act for the time regulating its police matters. The 22d clause itself affords sufficient evidence of that, for in the end of it there is found the provision "for carrying into effect the provisions of this section such commissioners shall have and may exercise and enforce all the powers and authorities conferred on them by the Police Act in force within such burgh at the time for carrying into effect the provisions of that Act in reference to footways on the streets of each burgh." Accordingly, this Act was intended to stand along with any Police Act in force at the time. The two Acts must be read together, and consistently with each other. There is another clause in the Act of 1874 which would go to the same effect, the 38th, which provides that as to Dundee and Broughty Ferry nothing in the Roads Act shall alter or affect the provisions of certain other Acts, and among them the general Police Act of 1862. It is not said that that is to be so in Kirriemuir, and the reason of the omission is plain. It was thought that if the Act of 1862 should be afterwards adopted there it would not do to say that the Roads Act was not to affect it, because in Kirriemuir it does most materially affect it. The omission therefore is accounted for and goes to aid the construction.

In addition to these considerations I am not sure whether the 149th clause of the Act of 1862 applies to a case of the kind at all. That section is in the part of the Act called part iv. sec. 3, the subject of which is "Paving and maintaining of streets," and which includes clauses 146 to 157. Now, while the 149th clause provides that owners are to pave the footways, the 156th clause, treating of the same subject-matter, and belonging to the same series, contains a provision that nothing in the Act shall affect any right of relief in regard to paving, &c.; and then, "nor shall any liability attaching in law to the trustees of any turnpike or other road, or other persons liable to make, pave, or causeway, maintain, or cleanse streets or the footways thereof, be affected, altered, or abridged thereby." It seems to me that the commissioners of police are within the description of persons by statute obliged to make, pave, and causeway the footways of Kirriemuir, and therefore that their liability was not to be affected by sec. 149.

It is satisfactory that we are able to come clearly to this conclusion, because otherwise a gross injustice would be done. The commissioners are levying a general assessment for the purposes of the Act of 1874, and one of those very purposes is that which they are now asking the owners of the adjoining properties to execute. I am clearly of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed.

Lord Deas, Lord Ardmillan, and Lord Mure concurred.

This interlocutor was pronounced:—"Refuse the appeal, and decern: Find the appellants liable in expenses," &c.

Irons & Roberts, S.S.C.—Webster & Will, S.S.C.—Agents.

JANE OR JANET HENDERSON, Pursuer and Appellant.—Rhind.
JAMES SOMERS OR SUMMERS, Defender and Respondent.—Black.

No. 158.

July 7, 1876.

Henderson v. Somers.

Parent and Child—Illegitimate Child—Proof—Presumption.—The defender in an action of filiation admitted intercourse with the pursuer 311 days before the birth of the child, and the pursuer did not allege any subsequent intercourse. Held, notwithstanding some evidence which tended to shew that the period of gestation was exceptionally long, that the pursuer had failed to overcome the presumption against so long a period of gestation, and the defender assoilzied.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Fife. I.

THIS was an action for the aliment of an illegitimate child, of which the pursuer was delivered on 26th September 1874.

The defender admitted having had connection with the pursuer on the night between the 17th and 18th November 1873, 311 days before the birth of the child; and the pursuer did not allege that any subsequent connection took place between them.

The only witnesses adduced for the pursuer were the defender herself and her mother. The material parts of the evidence bearing upon the period of gestation are given in the subjoined note.*

---

* James Somers or Summers, the defender,—. . . "In April 1874 I received a letter from the pursuer. I have not got it. It is destroyed. I burned it. It said that she had been dismissed from service because she was in the family-way."

Jane or Janet Henderson, the pursuer, after stating that she entered the service of Mr Berwick, Stravithy Mill, at Martinmas 1873, deponed,—"I left Mr Berwick's service on the 11th March, and on the 26th September 1874 I gave birth to a girl. It is still alive. I swear that the defender is the father. That child was begotten on the night of the 17th or the morning of the 18th November. The defender is the only man I ever had connection with, and the child born on the 26th September is the only child I ever had. . . . My mother told him my state. I never had my courses after I went to Stravithy Mill. Dr Craig gave me a dozen of powders. I took these powders and was very unwell. I went to Kennoway to reside with my cousins, whose mother had died. That was in May. I stayed there till August. I had to leave and come home. It was a month and three or four days before my child was born. I came home because I was so unwell. I thought I was going to have the child then. I felt the pains of labour. The pains continued less or more all the time till I had the child. Dr Morris, of Kennoway, attended me when the child was born. I do not think he saw me till the morning the child was born. Cross-examined—Mrs Berwick dismissed me because I was in the family-way, and I went home. It was nearly a month after I left Stravithy that I wrote the defender. I never told the defender before that I was with child; I did not know where he lived till then. . . . By the Court—The first person I told I was with child was my mother; I told her when I went home in March. I did not say when I expected the child to be born, but I told her the night when I had been with the defender, namely, the 17th November; and I told her I thought it was gotten that night. No one was present but our two selves. My mother made preparations of baby-linen; I did not tell her when they were to be ready. I never felt the movement of the child within me at all. I told no one but my mother that I was with child. My mistress asked me about it, but I did not answer her."

The pursuer's mother deponed,— . . . "My daughter went to Mr Berwick's service at Martinmas 1873. She came home to me on the 11th March 1874. She told me she had been sent away because she was in the family-way to James Summers. She said the child was begotten about the Old Term. She said that she did not know where Summers was living. I came to know his address, and gave it to my daughter, and she then wrote to him; several letters passed between them, and all that my daughter got were destroyed. . . . My daughter

No. 158.

July 7, 1876. Henderson v. Somers.

The Sheriff-substitute (Beatson Bell) found the paternity proved, and gave decree in favour of the pursuer.*

Upon appeal, the Sheriff (Crichton) recalled his Substitute's interlocutor, found that the pursuer had failed to prove that the defender was the father of the child, and assoilzied the defender.†

---

was very unwell from the time she came home till last harvest; she did not work a day all that time. I took her to Dr Craig's at Markinch, and explained she was with child. Dr Craig did not think so, and prescribed for her. Shortly after that my sister in Kennoway died, and the pursuer went there to look after her family; she came back to me in August very unwell, and I thought she was then going to have a child; she never was well again till the birth of the child. It was born on the 26th September. It is a girl, and still alive. (Q.) How long did your pregnancy continue before the birth of the pursuer? Question objected to. (A.) Three weeks more than the nine months. The pursuer is the only child I ever had."

* "NOTE.—The pursuer depones that her child was begotten by the defender on the night between the 17th and 18th November 1873, and the defender admits connection upon the occasion. If the pursuer is speaking the truth this involves a gestation of 311 days. The question then arises, is this such an incredible circumstance that the pursuer must necessarily be perjuring herself. There was no medical evidence brought upon either side, and I have great doubt as to the competency of referring to works on medical jurisprudence upon the point in the absence of such evidence; but both parties did appeal to Dr Taylor's work, and it appears from it that no judicial decision in this country or England has established the possibility of such a protracted gestation, but that in the American Courts even longer periods have been held established—(see Taylor, pp. 817 and 831 of edition of 1865). It humbly appears to me that there is no fixed limit in the law as to what is a possible and what an impossible period of gestation. In the language of Lord Jeffrey—'The period is not a rule of law, but a canon of evidence capable of limitation or extension.'—(Boyd v. Kerr, 17th June 1843, 5 D. 1216.) In the present case certain circumstances favour the pursuer. In the first place, her manner was perfectly truthful; but for the improbability of the matter of her deposition I should have believed her without hesitation. In the next place she consistently from the first announced to her mother the date of the child's conception, and she was actually taken ill with, what she thought, the pains of labour at the proper time, and these pains continued more or less till the birth of the child. If this be so, the question resolves rather into the possibility of unusually protracted parturition than into that of protracted gestation. It is undoubtedly a case of a very exceptional nature, but on the whole I think the paternity is established."

† "NOTE.—The pursuer depones that the last time the defender had intercourse with her was on the night between the 17th and 18th November 1873. The defender admits that he had intercourse with her on that occasion. The child was born on 26th September 1874. There is thus a period of 311 days between the time of the last intercourse and the birth of the pursuer's child. The question therefore arises whether, with such a lapse of time between the intercourse and the birth, the defender can be held to be the father of the pursuer's child.

"The usual period of gestation is from 275 to 280 days. It may, however, be protracted beyond that time, and there is one case which occurred in America, referred to by Mr Fraser in his treatise on the Law of Parent and Child, p. 12, in which it was held that a period of gestation protracted 313 days is not impossible.

"The Sheriff is not aware of any case in this country of filiation of a bastard child where, with such a lengthened period of gestation, the Court have held the paternity established. On the contrary, in the case of Boyd v. Kerr, 17th June 1843, 5 D. 1213, where the defender in an action for the aliment of a bastard having, on reference to his oath, admitted connection with the pursuer on one

No. 158.

July 7, 1876.
Henderson v. Somers.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session.

Argued for her;—In addition to the facts noted by the Sheriff-substitute, there was this strong corroboration of the pursuer's story, that she was so obviously pregnant by the beginning of March 1874 that it excited the notice of her mistress, and led to her dismissal, which shewed that she must have then been at least three months pregnant. The evidence of her mother as to her own pregnancy was also important, as shewing a hereditary tendency to protracted gestation.

The Court, without pronouncing a period of gestation of 311 days to be impossible, were of opinion that the pursuer necessarily undertook to shew that hers was an extraordinary case, and that the evidence adduced was too vague and too slight to overcome the strong presumption against her. Their Lordships therefore affirmed the judgment of the Sheriff.

M'CAUL & ARMSTRONG, S.S.C.—MACRAE & FLETT, W.S.—Agents.

No. 159.

July 8, 1876.
Macleay v. Campbell.

RODERICK MACLEAY, Pursuer.—Strachan.
DONALD CAMPBELL, Defender.—J. C. Smith.

Oath on Reference—Evidence Act, 1853 (16 Vict. c. 20), sec. 5.—Where a pursuer had been examined as a witness for himself, and had been cross-examined on the merits of the cause by the defender, the Court refused to sustain a reference to the pursuer's oath.

Observations on the Evidence Act, 1853, sec. 5.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Craighill.
M.

CAMPBELL and M'INTOSH, drapers, Dingwall, and Donald Campbell, feuar, Saltburn, who was father of the senior partner of Campbell and M'Intosh, granted a promissory-note for £100 to Roderick Macleay, draper, Tain. It was indorsed by Macleay, and paid as cash to a creditor of Campbell and M'Intosh. The firm afterwards got into difficulties, and Macleay was obliged to pay the balance of the note, amounting to £54, to the creditor. He raised this action against Donald Campbell for repayment.

The defence was that the note was granted for the accommodation of Campbell and M'Intosh only, and that Donald Campbell, though one of the promissors, was, in the knowledge of the pursuer, only a surety, like the pursuer himself.

A proof was led, in which the pursuer was examined as a witness on his own behalf, and cross-examined by the defender on the subject of the above defence.*

---

occasion 306 days previous to the birth of the child, but denied all other intercourse, the Court held that the oath was negative. In the recent case of Gibson v. M'Fagan, 20th March 1874, 1 Rettie, 853, the Court, assuming that intercourse had taken place 312 days before the birth of the child, held that this lapse of time negatived the presumption of the defender's paternity. The Lord President observed,—"If their (i.e. the pursuer's and defender's) one solitary meeting took place on the 22d January, as the defender says, then it is clear that he cannot be the father of the pursuer's child, at least it is in the highest degree improbable that he should be so. It would give the duration of the period of gestation as ten months and one week.'"

* Cross-examined.—"The defender was not due me any money at the time I signed the promissory-notes libelled. (Q.) Were Campbell and M'Intosh due you £100 at the date of that promissory-note? (A.) I signed it for them and for the defender. (Q.) But were they not due you money at that date? (A.) The bill was not given in consideration of a sum due to me. It was signed by me for the accommodation of the promissors. (Q.) Was it for the accommodation of the defender that you signed it? (A.) Yes, it was for the accommodation

No. 159.

July 8, 1876.
Macleay v. Campbell.

The defender led no parole proof.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor, to which the Court, on a reclaiming note, adhered:—"Finds it not proved 'that the promissory-note sued on, granted by defender and by Campbell and M'Intosh, sometime drapers in Dingwall, for £100, was not, at least to the extent of one-half of the contents, granted for the accommodation of the defender as well as of the said Campbell and M'Intosh:' Therefore repels the defences, and decerns the defender to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £47, 10s., being the amount to which the conclusions of the summons have been restricted," &c.

The defender then proposed to refer the cause to the pursuer's oath.

The pursuer argued that the reference ought not to be sustained. It was contrary to the spirit, if not to the letter, of the Evidence Act, 1853.[1] The defender had cross-examined the pursuer as a witness, and yet had shrunk from examining either himself or his son.

The defender argued;—It was admitted that the case did not fall within the letter of the Evidence Act. Reference to oath was therefore not excluded, or intended to be excluded, and there was no reason why the reference should not be sustained.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a case of some importance. The question is, whether the defender is entitled, under existing circumstances, to make a reference of the whole cause to the pursuer's oath. The action was raised on a promissory-note in which the pursuer was payee and the defender was one of two joint promissors. The pursuer admitted that the promissors were not due him any money, but he alleged that the note was for their accommodation, and having been made to pay, he has brought his action against this defender. After evidence was led the Lord Ordinary found that it was not proved "that the promissory-note sued on, granted by the defender, and by Campbell and M'Intosh, sometime drapers in Dingwall, for £100, was not, at least to the extent of one-half of the contents, granted for the accommodation of the defender as well as of the said Campbell and M'Intosh." To that interlocutor we adhered. The judgment depended on the import and effect of the evidence led, because the question was truly one of fact, whether the note was granted, at least to the extent of one-half, for the accommodation of the defender.

The evidence consisted in the examination of the pursuer as a witness in his own behalf, and his cross-examination by the defender. Some documents were produced by both parties, but no witnesses were adduced by the defender, and on that evidence the proof was declared closed.

The statute 16 Vict. c. 20, allows the examination of the parties to a cause with certain exceptions. But this permission is accompanied by a condition which is expressed in the 5th section,—"The adducing of any party as a witness in any cause or proceeding by the adverse party shall not have the effect of a reference to the oath of the party so adduced: Provided always that it shall not be competent to any party who has called and examined the opposite of both obligants. (Q.) In what way? (A.) The promissory-note shews that. I did not rank on the estate of Campbell and M'Intosh for that promissory-note, because I had nothing to rank on, and, besides, J. and A. Gibb ranked for it. There was a balance of £54 due upon it after Messrs Gibb had drawn the dividends."

---

[1] 16 Vict. c. 20, sec. 5, quoted in the Lord President's opinion.

party as a witness thereafter to refer the case or any part of it to his oath, and that in all other respects the right of reference to oath shall remain as at present established by the law and practice of Scotland." No. 159. July 8, 1876. Macleay v. Campbell.

In the present case the pursuer was adduced as a witness for himself, and therefore it appears to me that the section is not directly applicable. It must be observed that two expressions are made use of in the section, the "adducing" of a witness by the adverse party, and again that it shall not be competent for any party who has "called and examined the opposite party to refer the cause to his oath." The provision is thus confined to a party called and examined or adduced as a witness for the opposite party. Now, the pursuer was adduced for himself and called and examined for himself. But that, of course, gives the defender an opportunity of examining him in cross, and examining him according to our present practice, which is recognised by statute, in chief also.

The question of fact, as I have said, was, whether the promissory-note was granted in whole or in part for the accommodation of the defender, and unquestionably in the course of his cross-examination the pursuer was examined on that question most distinctly and pointedly.

Assuming, then, that the case does not fall within the statute, the question remains, whether, in these circumstances, we ought to sustain the reference. It is not incompetent, as the statute does not apply, but the clause leaves the law, in other respects, precisely as it stood before, and so leaves this as a matter which is entirely under the control of the Court.

Now, when a party who has had an opportunity of examining his adversary on oath on the whole merits of the case proposes to examine him again on a reference to his oath, unless there is some special reason for such a course it can only be for vexatious purposes. If the object of the party is to subject him to a more severe examination it is illegitimate, because if he desired to test him further it was due to his own carelessness that he did not take his opportunity. Therefore, unless there are special circumstances to explain and justify the reference, I do not think it would be expedient or right to hold that a party is entitled to have his adversary twice put on oath to speak to the facts of the case. Here a full opportunity of examining the pursuer on the whole case was not only afforded to the defender, but taken advantage of by him, and I do not think he is now entitled to another. I am therefore for refusing to sustain the reference.

LORD DEAS.—It is a very narrow question whether this case falls under the words of the 5th section of the statute. It is difficult to construe the Act as applicable only to cases where the one party has been cited by the opposite party. A witness may be adduced by a party without having been cited by him.

I agree with your Lordship that this is, so far, a question of circumstances. To raise the objection, the party must not only have had the opportunity of examining his adversary, but must have used that opportunity, otherwise the rule would be applicable to every case in which a party adduced himself as a witness. That would certainly be going too far. But in this case the defender did use his opportunity. The questions put in cross-examination related precisely to the matter now in dispute. It is difficult, therefore, to say that the pursuer was not adduced, called, and examined as a witness for the defender.

No. 159.

July 8, 1876.
Macleay v. Campbell.

Supposing, however, the reference not to be incompetent, the state of the facts goes deep into the question whether it should be allowed.

Undoubtedly it is only in a limited sense that the privilege of referring to oath is matter for the discretion of the Court. As interpreted by the decisions, our discretion to refuse a reference is restricted to cases where to allow it would lead to gross abuse. But this case would come, I think, under that category. For it amounts to an attempt to evade the statute, by referring the cause, after putting to the party on his oath the precise questions of fact which are intended to be inquired into under the reference.

LORD MURE.—I take the same view of this case as your Lordship in the chair. The words of the Evidence Act do not reach the present case, though the principle applies. But I am willing to deal with the question as if there was no such clause. And it being a fixed rule that it is in the discretion of the Court to sustain or refuse a reference, I am of opinion that it would not be expedient to sustain the reference in the present case.

The defender is in this position: He had the opportunity, and he availed himself of it, of examining his opponent on the whole defence, and he puts distinct questions to him to that effect. Now, the reason why the law has allowed reference to the oath of the opposite party is fully explained by Lord Moncreiff in the case of Pattinson v. Robertson, Dec. 4, 1846, 9 D. 226:—"It has been a fixed rule of the law of Scotland for centuries that a party, pursuer or defender, even after all other methods of discussion or evidence have failed, may say to his adversary before the Court—Though I cannot produce other evidence to shew the truth, I appeal it to your oath—to your own conscience as a Christian man. And our law, though different from others, allows this, on the same principle that however strong a case a man may apparently have on documents or apparent evidence he ought not to be permitted to maintain it against conscience, and that if he cannot himself swear to the facts as averred by him, and which, if true, must be known to himself, or deny upon oath the material averments of his adversary, though not otherwise proved, he shall not be permitted to avail himself of the appearance of evidence on the one side, or the absence of it on the other, to take a judicial sentence contrary to the truth as revealed by his own conscience."

In this case the pursuer has deponed to everything contained in the cause, so that he is not in the situation contemplated by the law.

LORD ARDMILLAN was absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Refuse to sustain the reference: Find the pursuer entitled to expenses," &c.

MACGREGOR & ROSS, S.S.C.—DANIEL TURNER, S.L.—Agents.

No. 160.

July 8, 1876.
Steele and Co. v. Dixon, &c.

ROBERT STEELE AND COMPANY, Pursuers.—Burnet—Trayner.
CHARLES E. DIXON AND ALFRED DIXON, Defenders.—MacLean.
THOMAS PERY POWELL, Defender.—D.-F. Watson—J. P. B. Robertson.
AMBROSE PARSONS, Defender.—Black.

Ship—Ships-husband—Powers of Managing Owners—Liability for Furnishings.—When a vessel is in a home port, and the owners easily accessible, the managing part-owner cannot, without specific authority, bind his co-owners for extensive structural alterations.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Curriehill. R.

THIS action was raised in September 1875 by Robert Steele and Company, shipbuilders in Greenock, against the registered owners of the iron steamship "Brazilian," lying at Greenock, and also against the firm of R. Byrne and Company, merchants and shipowners, London and Cardiff, for the purpose of recovering two sums of £5664 and £820, 1s. 2d., being the cost of certain repairs and furnishings executed by them in the summer of 1875 on the vessel on the employment of R. Byrne and Company, who owned 31-64ths thereof, and were the managing owners.

The first sum sued for was for work contracted for, and the second for additional work.

The pursuers averred that in entering into the contract R. Byrne and Company "acted for, and with the authority of, the owners of the said ship," and pleaded;—The sum first sued for being due to the pursuers under the contract libelled, and the sum second sued for being due to them under the employment libelled, they are entitled to decree therefor against the defenders as concluded for.

Messrs Byrne lodged no defences.

The other defenders, Messrs Charles and Alfred Dixon of Liverpool, Lieutenant Thomas Powell, and Mr Ambrose Parsons, solicitor, London, whose names at the date of the furnishings in question and also at the date of the action were upon the register as owners respectively of 21-64ths, 2-64ths, and 10-64ths of the ship, appeared, and stated defences to the effect that they had given no authority for the repairs and furnishings for which payment was claimed, and they maintained that the repairs and furnishings were not necessary, or such as a ships-husband or managing part-owner is entitled, when the vessel was in a home port, to order on the credit of his co-owners without their express authority.

Mr Parsons stated further that, although he was registered as the owner of ten shares, he merely held them in trust for one Pustau, to whom they had been mortgaged by R. C. Byrne (of R. Byrne and Company), in security of an advance.

A proof was allowed, from which the following facts appeared:—

In December 1872 Messrs C. E. and A. Dixon, who were then the registered owners of the whole vessel apparently in trust for persons of the name of Fernie, carrying on business in Liverpool as "The Merchants' Trading Company," entered into a contract with R. Byrne and Company by which the latter were to purchase two-thirds of the ship (the price of the entire ship being fixed at £19,000), and were to become the managers of the ship upon their usual terms as regards commission, &c. The other one-third was to be held by the Messrs Dixon, who were not to transfer the same without Messrs Byrne's consent. The contract contained a clause that in the event of Messrs Byrne deciding to re-engine the ship they were to find the money to do so, all profits on the one-third interest not held by Messrs Byrne to be retained by them until the amount advanced for the new engines should be paid to them. In implement of this contract 43-64th shares of the ship were formally transferred by Messrs Dixon to Richard Clarke Byrne.

No. 160. July 8, 1876. Steele and Co. v. Dixon, &c.

Of the 43-64ths acquired by R. Byrne and Company two shares were afterwards purchased by Admiral Powell, who sold them in the early part of 1874 to his nephew, the defender, Lieutenant Thomas Pery Powell.

Ten more of the shares held by R. Byrne and Company were transferred in September 1874 to the defender Parsons, who, however, although ex facie absolute owner, merely held the shares as trustee for one Pustau, a German, who, not being a British subject, was incapable of being himself registered as owner, but who, it was arranged, should in this way have a security over the vessel for advances made by him to the Byrnes. A deed of declaration of trust and agreement between Parsons and R. C. Byrne, setting forth the position of Parsons in the matter, was executed unico contextu with a bill of sale of the ten shares to Parsons.

In December 1872, when the contract of sale was entered into under which R. Byrne and Company became managing owners of the vessel, she was lying in the Birkenhead dock. She had been classed in the Liverpool registry as for a period of eighteen years from the date of her launch in 1852, with a continuation of the class from year to year thereafter subject to an annual survey. This class was continued for only one year after the eighteen years expired, and it lapsed altogether in November 1872 in consequence of the annual survey not having been made.

Soon after they became managers Messrs Byrne having decided to put new engines into the vessel in terms of their agreement with the Dixons took her round to Greenock for this purpose. For the next two years the vessel lay in the Clyde, while the work of preparing her for the new engines went on very slowly. No anxiety seems to have been shewn by any of the owners to get her ready for sea until the autumn of 1874, when a proposal was made to employ the ship in the China trade, which, however, was not carried into effect. Afterwards Byrne and Company procured a survey of the vessel with a view to ascertaining the repairs which would be necessary to have the vessel restored to her place on the Liverpool register. These proved to be very considerable, and after some time they decided to have the vessel double plated and repaired in terms of a report which they obtained from Lloyds' surveyor of the district in January 1875, in order to obtain the class 95 A at Lloyds, the highest class which is given at Lloyds to vessels not originally built under special survey. The pursuers made an offer for the work on 19th February 1875, which was finally accepted by Messrs Byrne on 3d April 1875.

The pursuers made no inquiries as to the owners of the ship,* and proceeded to execute the work contracted for, with the exception of a few plates, which were not fitted on when the work was finally stopped on 30th August 1875. They also performed extra work ordered by Messrs Byrne, a part of which was the repairing of a hole in the ship's side, caused by a gale of wind knocking her against the pier before she got into the dock.

The first suggestion which Messrs Byrne appear to have made to the Dixons with regard to the expediency of having the vessel reclassed was in a letter dated 27th November 1874. The letter was forwarded by the Dixons to the Fernies, who wrote Messrs Dixon that they could not consent to the proposal. That reply was at once communicated by the

* Mr Robert Steele, managing partner of the pursuers' firm, stated in evidence,—"I never asked, for it is not our practice to inquire as to the credit of any person giving us employment. When employed to make any repairs we trust the ship and the owners for the expenses."

Dixons to Messrs Byrne. In this and subsequent letters the Fernies took up the position, apparently erroneous, that the Byrnes were responsible for allowing the ship's class to lapse, whereas the class had lapsed before the Byrnes had anything to do with her. Throughout the correspondence the Dixons acted simply as the medium of communication between the Byrnes and the Fernies, who never corresponded directly with one another. The correspondence proceeded on the footing that the Fernies and not the Dixons were the true owners of the shares nominally held by the latter.

The first intimation of the contract entered into by Messrs Byrne with the pursuers was apparently made in a letter by Messrs Byrne to the Dixons, dated 5th July 1875, by which time one-third of the contract work had been executed. A copy of the contract was enclosed. The letter was acknowledged by the Dixons, but they did not in their reply refer to the contract. A good deal of correspondence followed, in which the Fernies again and again repudiated liability. They complained strongly of the conduct of the Byrnes, and maintained, apparently, that the Byrnes were bound to do everything at their own expense necessary to have the vessel reclassed. Neither the Dixons nor the Fernies wrote to the pursuers countermanding the orders given by Messrs Byrne, nor, indeed, had they communication of any kind with the pursuers.

Mr Powell and Mr Parsons were not consulted as to the reclassing of the vessel nor the execution of repairs, and the former at least knew nothing about the matter until served with the summons in the present action.

The Lord Ordinary, on 15th February 1876, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Assoilzies the defenders, Charles E. Dixon, Alfred Dixon, Thomas Pery Powell, and Ambrose Parsons, from the whole conclusions of the action, and decerns: Finds the pursuers liable in expenses to the said defenders," &c.*

---

* "NOTE.—(After a narrative of the facts, of which an abstract has been given)—There is no doubt as to the liability of R. Byrne and Company and the partners of that firm for these sums, because they gave the order for the work. The question now to be considered is, whether the other defenders,—viz. Messrs Dixon, Lieut. Powell, and Mr Parsons, as registered part-owners of the vessel,—are also liable therefor to the pursuers, as having expressly or by implication ordered or sanctioned the employment of the pursuers. Now, in the first place, it is quite certain that the pursuers had no communication on the subject of any of these operations with any of the owners of the vessel, except Messrs Byrne and Company. They apparently did not know or inquire who the other owners were, and they seem to have taken it for granted that the owners of such a vessel as the 'Brazilian' would not only be liable for the repairs, but were in a position to meet their liability." . . . (His Lordship referred to the correspondence, the import of which has been given in the preceding narrative).—"I think it must therefore be held that the pursuers have failed to prove that the defenders, C. E. Dixon, A. Dixon, Parsons, and Powell, or any of them, authorised Byrne and Company to employ the pursuers to do the work in question, or to have any such work executed at all.

"Indeed, in the case of Parsons, it is inconceivable that he should have given any such authority, as it is clearly proved that he had no beneficial interest in the vessel, and that he held the 10-64ths of the vessel merely as a trustee for Byrne, the real owners of the shares, in order to secure Pustau, Byrne's creditor, for the advances which he had made. And in the case of Powell it is proved that he never knew or heard anything of the matter at all.

"This being so, the next question is, whether these repairs and alterations were necessary operations, and such as Messrs Byrne and Company, in their character of ships-husbands or managing owners, were entitled to order on the

No. 160.

July 8, 1876.
Steele and Co. v. Dixon, &c.

The pursuers reclaimed.

Argued for them;—(1) The repairs and furnishings in question were credit of their co-owners, the vessel being in a home port and not in the course of a voyage. I think this question must be answered in the negative. The law upon the point is, I think, nowhere better stated than in Parsons on Shipping, vol. i. p. 100—'In general, the part-owners are liable in solido for the repairs of a ship, or for necessaries actually supplied. This rests in part upon the general principle that one receiving and holding a benefit must pay for it, and in part upon the peculiar nature of this property, and the necessity there is for the public good as well as for the advantage of each owner, that wherever the ship may be, all who are interested in her should be regarded as authorising such expenditure for repairs or supplies as she may require. . . . . If the things furnished are in any reasonable conformity with the character of the ship, or the nature and purposes of the voyage, or if in fact they are such that any rational part-owner may be supposed to have desired them, it will be difficult for the absent part-owners to escape their liability. . . . It has been said that a part-owner of a vessel is not liable to another for repairs made at a home port without his consent. If made against his prohibition he would not be liable, but we should suppose his consent would generally be inferred if the repairs were reasonable and proper, and he made no objection. A considerable distinction exists in respect to all the powers of a part-owner, or master, or a ships-husband, between the exercise of them abroad and in a home port. A ship far from its home might perish for want of aid which was delayed till all the owners could be consulted; but, if at home, all who will have to pay have an unquestionable right to be consulted. It is not, however, quite certain whether the fact that the vessel is in a home port, which certainly limits these powers, goes so far as to destroy them; in other words, the question whether one part-owner can bind another in a home port without specific authority may be regarded as still open.' And the question was dealt with as open in the leading case in England of Mitcheson v. Oliver, 1855, 5 Ellis and B. 446.

"As regards the powers of a ships-husband, whether he be a part-owner or a stranger, to bind the owners for repairs and furnishings, the rule is that, being the general agent of all the owners, he binds his principals while acting within his authority. The powers and duties of the ships-husband are stated at some length by Mr Bell in his Comms., vol. i. (M'L's. edn.) pp. 552, 553, and they are more succinctly stated by Parsons, vol. i. p. 109, as follows:—'His duties are determined mainly by usage; they are in general to provide for the complete seaworthiness of the ship, to take care of her in port, to see that she has on board all necessary and proper papers, to make contracts for freight, and collect the freight and all returns . . . . . He cannot borrow money nor give up the lien for freight, nor insure, nor purchase a cargo for the owners without especial authority.'—(P. 110.) Questions of this kind have not arisen to any great extent in Scotland, but there are numerous decisions in England as to the powers of a ships-husband or managing owner, or a shipmaster, to bind the general body of owners in solidum. In the leading case of Mitcheson v. Oliver, already referred to, Lord Campbell had told the jury at the trial that 'the defendant would not be liable to the plaintiff's demand merely as owner of the ship, or by reason of his being registered as such owner; nor would he be liable merely by the orders being given to the plaintiff by the defendant's master of the ship.' And to that extent the direction was approved of by the Court of Exchequer Chamber when the case was brought under review; but the Court went beyond this ruling, and held that the defendant would not be liable unless it were proved that the master acted as the defendant's master of the ship, with his privity and consent, and the goods and work were supplied to and done upon the ship, not merely upon the credit of the owner by the bona fide order of the master given with the privity of the owner, but as in a contract with the owner on orders given by the master as for him. And in the later case of Whitwell v. Perrin, 1858, 4 C. B. (N. S.), p. 416, Byles, J., said, 'Since the case of Mitcheson v. Oliver, 5 Ellis and B., 419, the law is restored to what it such as Messrs Byrne in their character of ships-husbands or managing owners were entitled to order on the credit of their co-owners. The

No. 160.

July 8, 1876.

Steele and Co. v. Dixon, &c.

formerly was, viz., that the mere fact of a man being owner, or part-owner, of a ship, or registered as owner, does not make him liable for work done or goods ordered for the ship. But as Jervis, C. J., put it in Brodie v. Howard, 17 C. B., 109, 117, the question is, with whom was the contract; was the party giving the orders the agent of the owners for that purpose? The mere fact of the goods being ordered by the captain or the ships-husband is no evidence to go to the jury, but here not only was the defendant beneficially interested, but he knew that Whitwell the elder was acting as ships-husband, and he received a share of the profits. That clearly was evidence to go to the jury that the ships-husband had authority to contract on behalf of the owners.' Now, I think that, upon the evidence in the present case, it is quite impossible to hold that Byrne and Company made the contract with the pursuers as for or on behalf of the present defenders, seeing that the latter had not only not authorised or sanctioned but had declined to sanction the repairs and alterations of the extent and character ordered by Byrne. And if I am right in this, there is an end of the case.

"But even if it should be held that notwithstanding the communications between Byrne and Company and the defenders, the former, as managing owners or ships-husbands, had power to bind the latter, the question remains, were the operations ordered of the nature of necessary repairs, and falling within the proper range of the ships-husband's duties and powers.

"In the case of Chappel v. Bray, 1860, 30 L. J., 24, it was decided that 'an express authority is necessary from a part-owner of a ship to the ships-husband to order work not necessary as repairs.' In that case the work ordered was the lengthening of a vessel, which was held to be unnecessary, and therefore not to fall within the powers of the ships-husband. On the other hand, in the case of Barker v. Highley, 1863, 15 C. B., N. S., p. 27, it was held that 'the ships-husband or managing owner is an agent appointed to do what is necessary to enable the ship to prosecute her voyage and earn freight.' In that case money was borrowed to release the ship from Admiralty process, by which it had been arrested to meet claims arising out of a collision. And it was held that as the vessel was prevented from prosecuting her voyage by the arrest, the advance of money by the ships-husband was necessary, and formed a debt by the whole body of owners.

"The result of all the cases seems to be that the 'necessity of the repairs and furnishings is a question for a jury,' and that the urgency of the repairs, the stoppage of the vessel in the midst of a voyage or on the eve of her departure by repairs being suddenly found necessary, and the facts that the vessel is in a home port, and that the owners can be easily communicated with, are all jury elements in considering the question of necessity. It appears to me that the evidence in the present case negatives the necessity of the repairs. In the first place, the repairs were not rendered necessary by any sudden emergency. The vessel had been lying in the Clyde for nearly two years, and the fact that she had been there undergoing repairs and being fitted up with new engines was known to the pursuers. The vessel had not been chartered for a voyage, because the arrangement with Pustau that the vessel was to sail for China within six weeks from 21st September 1874 had come to an end, and no new charter had been obtained. It must therefore have been plain to the pursuers that the repairs which they were employed to make, and which were recommended by Boolds in consequence of the general rottenness of the vessel, were not matters of urgency requiring such immediate attention as to prevent the authority of the owners being previously asked for. Indeed, the fact that a period of two months elapsed between the pursuers' original offer for the work and Byrne and Company's acceptance gave the pursuers ample opportunity, if they had chosen, to consult the register and communicate with the persons there appearing as owners before entering into the contract. In the second place, I think that the repairs and alterations were of a nature and extent so material and extraordinary, that repairs were necessary in order to get the vessel classed, in other words, to make her a freight-earning subject, for it was in evidence, and, indeed, was obvious, that an unclassed vessel could only be insured at rates practically prohibitory, and no merchant would put his goods on board a vessel where he could not get an insurance. If it were suggested that less thorough and expensive repairs would have been sufficient to obtain a lower class, the answer was that the great bulk of the expense was necessary for even the lowest class, and it was evidently an act of prudent management to incur the comparatively slight additional expense in order to secure a good class. In short, to use the language of Mr Parsons, quoted by the Lord Ordinary, the things furnished were such that any rational part-owner might be supposed to have desired them.[1] (2) The they cannot be regarded as necessarily falling under the power of a shipe-husband to order. Indeed, I think it is certain that the co-owners, had they been made aware of the circumstances before the contract was entered into, would have repudiated it, and at once have communicated with Messrs Steele to inform them of their repudiation, just as they did when they became aware of it for the first time in July 1875. It is said that without these repairs the vessel could not have been re-classed, and that it is difficult to insure an unclassed vessel. But where the operations required to secure this result were so extensive as in the present case, and so little urgent, the pursuers ought not, in common prudence, to have undertaken to execute them without ascertaining that the owners desired or sanctioned such extraordinary outlay. And, on the whole matter, I am of opinion that the defenders who have lodged defences are entitled to absolvitor, the pursuers being of course entitled to decree in absence against the defenders who have not lodged defences.

No. 160. July 8, 1876. Steele and Co. v. Dixon, &c.

---

"It was specially pleaded in defence for Mr Parsons that, although he stands on the register as an ex facie absolute owner of ten shares of the vessel, yet, as he had no beneficial interest, and was merely a trustee, holding the shares in security for a creditor of Byrne, and for reconveyance to Byrne on the payment of that creditor's debt, and as he never was in possession of any part of the vessel or its profits, he is not liable. And the following passage from Parsons on Shipping (vol. i. 131) was cited in support of the defence:—'A mortgagee, who does not have the possession and control of the ship does not authorise a furnisher to consider him the owner; and if credit be given him, it does not bind him unless given with his consent. . . . . And even if a person takes a bill of sale of a vessel, absolute in its terms, and is registered as owner, and the person furnishing the supplies consulted the record of the Custom-House, and gave credit to him as owner, he is not liable for such if the bill of sale was intended as a collateral security, and he has never taken the vessel into his possession or control, or exercised any acts of ownership.' This, I assume, to be a correct statement of the law as administered in America, and perhaps the proposition is a direct corollary from the law as laid down by the English Courts in the cases of Mitcheson v. Oliver, and Whitwell v. Perrin. But in the view which I take of the present case generally, it is not necessary to say whether the doctrine is sound or not. There are sufficient materials disclosed in the evidence in this case to justify a verdict in favour of Parsons and his co-defenders.

"It is only necessary further to observe that I have not dealt with the pursuers' claim for the minor repairs, amounting to £820, as on a different footing from the repairs executed under the contract. These minor repairs were all more or less connected with the contract work, excepting those items which are for repairing damage done to the vessel while lying off the harbour before going into dock. But the whole of these repairs were executed along with and under the same employment as those under the contract, and they must, in my opinion, all be dealt with on the same footing as regards the liability of the defenders."

[1] Bell's Com. (M'L.'s ed.), vol, i. pp. 552, &c., 567, &c.; Story on Agency, sec. 35; Abbott (11th ed.), p. 79; Parsons on Shipping, vol. i. pp. 100, 101, also pp. 109, &c.; Green v. Briggs, 6 Hare's Ch. Cases (Sir J. Wigram's judg-

No. 160.
July 8, 1876.
Steele and Co. v. Dixon, &c.

repairs were acquiesced in by the defenders, Messrs Dixon. They were the registered owners. They were informed by Messrs Byrne's letter of 5th July, if not earlier, that the vessel was being put by the persons whom they had constituted managing owners into the hands of a ship-builder for repairs, by which they were to benefit. Knowing the law, as they must be held to have done, that the manager had power to bind them for necessary repairs, they were bound distinctly to repudiate any liability. (3) The pursuer was entitled in any view to recover from the defenders the items for repairing the hole made in the ship while lying in the harbour. It was unquestionably within the powers of the managing owners to have this damage repaired. (4) The pursuers had put value on the ship to the extent of about £6000, and they were entitled to recover against the defenders in quantum lucrati.

The pursuers did not press their case against Mr Parsons in the Inner-House.

The defenders, Messrs Dixon and Mr Powell, joined in supporting the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, on the ground that such extensive repairs and reconstruction of the ship did not fall within Messrs Byrne's authority as managers; that as the ship was in a home port, and as there was no urgency, and the other part-owners were easily accessible, their express authority was necessary to bind them.[1] The Messrs Dixon also maintained that although appearing on the register as owners of 21-64ths, they had really no interest in the ship, being mere trustees for the Fernies.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The Lord Ordinary has accompanied his interlocutor with a long and satisfactory analysis of the evidence, and by a commentary on the authorities. Concurring as I do in the views of the Lord Ordinary, I shall content myself with expressing shortly the grounds on which my concurrence is mainly founded. (After stating the facts)—On the general law applicable to the present case, I am of opinion that when a vessel is in a home port a managing part-owner may bind the other part-owners for ordinary repairs; but that he is not entitled to bind them, without specific authority, for unusual and structural alterations, nor for work to fit the vessel for a new employment, on which the part-owners had not resolved. Something in such cases may depend on whether the other part-owners are easily accessible, and there will be a greater presumption in favour of the managing part-owner's authority should the others be beyond the reach of immediate communication. In the present case, as all the defenders were at hand, this element does not arise, and the first question is whether the contract with the pursuer, which was for structural and unusual alterations, was entered into by the direct authority of the defenders, or any of them.

As regards the Messrs Dixon, they maintain that they are entitled to absolvitor, on the ground that they not only never gave any authority to Byrne and Company to incur this account, but, on the contrary, repudiated responsibility from first to last, and that on the ground that although their names stood ment, p. 405; Webster v. Seekamp, 1821, 4 Barn. and Ald. 352; Preston v. Tamplin, May 23, 1857, 2 Hurlston and Norman, 363; Barker v. Highley, July 6, 1863, 32 L. J., C. P., 270, and 15 C.B. (N. S.) p. 27; Whitwell v. Perrin, May 7, 1858, 4 C. B. (N. S.) p. 412; Coulthurst v. Sweet, May 30, 1866, L. R. 1 C. P. 649; Hibbs v. Ross, June 13, 1866, L. R., 1 Q. B. 534.

---

[1] Authorities cited by Lord Ordinary; also French v. Backhouse, May 11, 1775, 5 Burr, 2728; Arthur v. Barton, 1840, 6 Meeson and Welsby, 138; Hamiltons v. Landale, May 12, 1860, 22 D. 1059, 32 Scot. Jur. 488.

No. 160.

July 8, 1876.
Steele and Co. v. Dixon, &c.

on the register they were mere names for Fernie and Company. Without going into the evidence, I am very clearly of opiuion that this defence is entirely consistent with the facts. Messrs Byrne never treated the Dixons as principals, and never considered them as such, but dealt with them solely as interposed persons between them and the real part-owners, namely, Fernie and Company. For some reason, which is not disclosed, Messrs Byrne made it a consideration of their purchase that Fernie and Company should not stand on the register as owners, but that the Messrs Dixon's name should be so entered, and that they should not re-transfer their apparent interest without the consent of Byrne and Company. There are some indications that at one time Messrs Dixon were the creditors of Fernie and Company, but they do not appear ever to have been mortgagees, and we have no evidence that at the date of the contract with the pursuers they were creditors of that firm. It has been long settled that the mere fact of a person being registered as owner does not of itself infer liability for furnishings by third parties on account of the ship. Even a mortgagee, not in possession, is not liable merely because his name appears on the register; and much less can a party be liable who merely lends his name for the benefit and to serve the purpose of another. Byrne and Company had no authority to bind Dixon and Company individually, and never supposed that they had.

How far Fernie and Company are liable to the shipbuilder is a question not raised in this action, and is one on which I desire for that reason to express no opinion. That they were part-owners through the Dixons, their trustees, seems to be the fact; although even that fact, in their absence, it would be unjust to assume. There may also be a question how far, although as between Byrne and Company and Messrs Fernie the latter insisted that they should not be responsible, they may not be responsible to the shipbuilder for work done on their property, of which they were cognisant, which they thought proper to be done, and permitted to be done, and of which they received or may receive the benefit. These are questions which cannot be raised and decided here, because the Messrs Fernie are not parties to this suit.

As regards Mr Powell, who held a very small stake in the vessel, I am of opinion that he is not responsible as part-owner for the important alterations on the vessel, which were the main subject of this contract. A minor question has been raised in regard to the amount of expense incurred in repairing certain injuries incurred in removing the vessel from the docks at Greenock. The Lord Ordinary has not allowed this item, looking at the account as one. I think it would be unfair to Mr Powell, in the absence of the other proprietors of one-third of the vessel, to treat this as an action for ordinary repairs. I propose to reserve this claim, to be made good, if the pursuers are so advised, in an action to which all the proper parties are called.

Lord Neaves, Lord Ormidale, and Lord Gifford concurred.

This interlocutor was pronounced:—"Adhere to the said interlocutor, but reserve to the pursuers the right to insist against the defender, Thomas Pery Powell, for payment of the sum of £271, 15s. 5d., being the amount of the two accounts, Nos. 13 and 14 of process, in any action they may be advised to raise against all the parties interested, and to them their defences thereto as accords, and decern: Find the pursuers liable in additional expenses," &c.

Mason & Smith, S.S.C.—Hamilton, Kinnear, & Beatson, W.S.—Mackenzie & Black, W.S.—Wilson & Dunlop, W.S.—Agents.

JOHN WHITE, Pursuer and Respondent.—D.-F. Watson—R. V. Campbell. No. 161.
RICHARD MUNRO AND OTHERS, Defenders and Appellants.—Balfour—Mackintosh.

July 11, 1876.
White v. Munro, &c.

Ship—Shipbroker—Commission.—Held that a shipbroker was not entitled to commission upon the sale of a ship, in respect that, though the seller had been introduced to the purchaser by the broker, the sale which ultimately took place was not in consequence of the broker's introduction.

M & Co. of London requiring a steamer for correspondents in China put themselves in communication with a shipbroker, who brought under their notice a steamer named the "E," which was for sale, and wrote to the owners mentioning that he had done so, and requesting that, in the event of a sale, they would reserve his commission. After some correspondence between the shipbroker and the owners it was arranged that the vessel should be inspected on behalf of M & Co. The inspector's report proved unfavourable, and the shipbroker communicated the result to the owners, saying that "his friends must decline her."

About three months after the date of this letter a Captain B arrived in England, commissioned by the persons in China, for whom M & Co. had been acting, to buy a steamer "through the medium and with the assistance of M & Co." Shortly after his arrival, B went to a friend D, who had considerable experience in the requirements of the China trade, and who happened also to be a friend of the owners of the "E," and was interesting himself in getting her sold. D recommended the "E" as well suited for the purpose, and after a meeting with one of the owners B agreed provisionally to purchase the vessel, subject to the approval of his China constituents and the result of an inspection of the vessel. Upon B writing to M & Co., reporting what he had done, they informed him that this was the same vessel which had been previously introduced to their notice by the shipbroker, and had been unfavourably reported on. B accordingly waited on the shipbroker, and had several interviews with him about the ship. B decided to proceed with an inspection which had been arranged, and the result was that M & Co. were induced by B and D to reconsider their determination, and to purchase the vessel for their correspondents in China. The shipbroker thereupon claimed commission from the sellers.

Held (diss. Lord Justice-Clerk) that the shipbroker was not entitled to commission, in respect that the sale which was ultimately effected was not in consequence of his introduction, or of anything done by him.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire. I.

THIS was an action raised in July 1874 in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow at the instance of John White, shipbroker, London, against Richard Munro, merchant, Glasgow, and the trustees of the late William Mories, also merchant in Glasgow, who were the owners respectively of 23 and 41 sixty-fourth shares of the steamer "Europe."

The conclusions of the summons were that the defenders should be decerned to pay to the pursuer "the sum of £450, being commission at the customary rate of 2½ per centum upon the purchase price of the steamship 'Europe,' which belonged to and was sold by the defenders to Messieurs Matheson and Company, merchants and shipowners in London, in or about the month of March 1874, at the price of £18,000 sterling, and which sale was negotiated through the pursuer in his capacity of shipbroker; or otherwise the said sum of £450, or such lesser sum as shall be fixed in the course of the process as a reasonable commission or remuneration to the pursuer for the services rendered by him in introducing the buyers, Messieurs Matheson and Company, to the defenders, in the month of August 1873, and recommending the said steamer to them as suitable for their purposes, and which introduction and recommendation, and the negotiations which supervened thereon during the months of August, September, and October 1873, conduced to the ultimate purchase of the said steamer by Messieurs Matheson and Company as aforesaid, with interest on the said sum of £450 sterling, or such sum as shall be found to be due to the pursuer."

No. 161. July 11, 1876. White v. Munro, &c.

The nature of the defence appears from the defenders' pleas in law:—(1) The defenders not having dealt with the pursuer on any footing in the negotiation and sale of the steamer, and the same not having been sold through his intervention as broker, they are not liable to him in any commission on the price, either by introducing a purchaser to them or otherwise. (2) The pursuer not having rendered any services to the defenders in connection with the sale of said steamer they are not liable to him in any remuneration whatever.

A proof was allowed, of which the result was as follows:—In August 1873 Messrs Matheson and Company of London were instructed by correspondents in China to purchase two steamers which were required at Shanghai. They put themselves in communication with the pursuer, who, among other vessels, brought under their notice the steamer "Europe," belonging to the defenders.

On 29th August 1873 the pursuer wrote Mories, Munro, and Company, merchants, Glasgow, who represented the owners of the "Europe,"—"Gentlemen,—Messrs Matheson and Company of this city are desirous of purchasing a spar-deck steamer. I have named 'Europe' to them as likely to suit; and as they have a representative at present in the neighbourhood of Glasgow he will probably call at your address, which I have handed to his firm. In the event of business, which I trust will result, please reserve my commission; and oblige yours, &c."

Upon this, Mories, Munro, and Company entered into correspondence with the pursuer at considerable length, giving all the particulars required by Matheson and Company, and an inspection of the "Europe," which then lay at Antwerp, was ultimately arranged and carried out by a Captain Crockett on behalf of Matheson and Company. Crockett's report was, however, unfavourable, and on the 7th October 1873 the pursuer wrote Mories, Munro, and Company—"The inspector has seen 'Europe,' and does not write a good report of her bottom, so my friends must decline her. I regret this, after all our negotiations, and his making the journey to Antwerp."

Throughout these negotiations Matheson and Company of London were referred to as the persons who proposed to buy the ship, although they were in fact acting for Jardine, Matheson, and Company of China, who, again, were acting for some native merchants there, trading under the name of the "China Merchants Steam Navigation Company."

On 7th October Jardine, Matheson, and Company telegraphed to Matheson and Company—"Until our letters come to hand suspend acting upon our last instructions relating to second new steamer." * In a subsequent letter, dated 13th November 1873, they informed Matheson and Company that a Captain Bolton was going to England, commissioned by the Chinese Company, "to have built, or to buy through your medium, and with your assistance, two boats for our native friends."

On 6th November 1873 Captain Bolton wrote from Shanghai to a friend, Mr Peter Denny,† Dumbarton—"I have just time before the mail closes to send you a line, saying I hope to be on my way home by the next French mail, leaving here a week hence, to see after the building

* It appeared that one of the two steamers required had already been procured from some other quarter.

† Designed in the proof as "shipbroker." It was stated by the counsel for the pursuer that this was a clerical error for "shipbuilder."

No. 161.
July 11, 1876.
White v. Munro, &c.

of two steamers for the China Merchants Company, concerning which Mr Tongking Sing* has already written you. His instructions are to the effect of getting estimates from various builders, the same to be wired to him for decision. I shall come up to see you on my arrival."

Captain Bolton arrived in England in the beginning of January 1874, and soon after his arrival went down to Dumbarton to see Mr Denny.

Mr Denny happened to be an intimate friend of the senior partner of Mories, Munro, and Company, who had died shortly before, and in order to benefit his family he was interesting himself in the sale of the "Europe." After Captain Bolton had explained the kind of vessels he required for his constituents, Mr Denny, who had considerable experience in regard to the requirements of the China trade, informed him that a ship had been placed in his hands for sale, which he considered in every way well adapted for the purpose, and shewed him the particulars of the "Europe." Denny then made an appointment with Mr Munro, the surviving partner of Mories, Munro, and Company, and owner of 23 sixty-fourths of the "Europe," to meet Bolton at his office at Dumbarton. A meeting accordingly took place about the middle of January 1874, at which Munro, Bolton, and Denny were present. Denny stated that he would charge no commission, and suggested that the price should be £19,000. According to the evidence of Denny and Munro a minute of sale was then drawn up by Denny, narrating the price and other conditions upon which a sale would be concluded, which Munro signed, and Bolton took away. Bolton was not examined as a witness, the parties having been unable to discover where he was. No copy of the minute was taken.

On 13th January 1874 Bolton wrote to Matheson and Company—"To-day I have received the offer of a steamer, which I think would suit the C. M. S. N. Coy. very well indeed. At present she is in Constantinople, but will be home and available in four to five weeks. Herewith some of her particulars,—s.s. 'Europe.' . . . Mr Denny recommends her most highly, and desires me to say so. He also considers the price most moderate. . . . Will you kindly wire the requisite information concerning the steamer the 'Europe' to Messrs Jardine, Matheson, and Company, Shanghai, for the benefit of Mr Tongking Sing? Should the China people decide upon her purchase, my present arrangement with her owners is to the effect that before being taken over she is to be docked for inspection, cleaned, painted, and put in good order at the expense of her present owners. In fact, no final answer is to be given until she is docked. Any dispute to be left to Mr Denny."

Matheson and Company replied on 14th January—"We are in receipt of your letter of yesterday, and note what you say regarding the steamer 'Europe.' This vessel has already been inspected by Captain Crockett, who came to the conclusion that she was not suited for the trade of the Merchants Company's boats. . . . Before telegraphing, we think it well that you should be made aware of what Captain Crockett wrote to us about the steamer in October, and we enclose extracts from his letters for your consideration."

On 15th January Bolton wrote Matheson and Company—"Dear Sirs,—Your favour of the 13th, enclosing extracts from Captain Crockett's reports on the s.s. 'Europe,' I received to-day, for which my best thanks. I have written to Captain Crockett for further particulars; for it is difficult to reconcile his report on the steamer's bottom with the strong recommendation of Mr Denny's, who told me I could quote him as advising the

* Manager of the China Merchants Steam Navigation Company.

No. 161.
July 11, 1876.
White v. Munro, &c.

purchase. He assured me he had no personal interest in the sale. . . . Thanks for not sending the telegram, and I would wish now to wait until I hear more particulars from Captain Crockett."

After receiving Matheson and Company's letter of the 14th January, Bolton told Denny what Matheson and Company had written. Mr Denny's evidence as to the conversation was as follows:—"I then said to Captain Bolton that I did not consider Captain Crockett an authority in such matters, and that as part of the condition of sale effected by me was that the ship was to be inspected on her arrival in dock, in Bristol, she being then on her way home from Constantinople, that I would send my manager, Mr Ramage, who, being a practical shipbuilder, would be able to give a reliable opinion on the matter. To this arrangement Captain Bolton assented."

A few days after this Bolton returned to London, and called upon Matheson and Company, who referred to the pursuer as having brought the "Europe" under their notice in the previous autumn. Bolton, accordingly, waited on the pursuer, and had several interviews with him. What passed is thus stated by the pursuer in his evidence:—"When he (Bolton) came back to London I heard that Mr Denny of Dumbarton had highly recommended the 'Europe' as likely to suit Matheson and Company's requirements. In fact, when Bolton returned to London he consulted me about that very purchase, and I understand that upon his report the ship was ultimately bought by Matheson and Company. . . . He told me he had been round the shipbuilding yards with the object of getting tenders for building, and to know what the builders' prices were. He said he had seen Mr Denny. He said he had made no business transaction with him at that time, that is to say, that he had concluded no transaction—no contract. He told me that Denny had mentioned the 'Europe,' and had spoken very favourably of it; that he had mentioned this to Messrs Matheson, and that they had said that she had previously been inspected by Crockett, who had not reported favourably. I told Captain Bolton that I thought the 'Europe' was a very suitable vessel for him, and that I understood the objections Captain Crockett made to her were slight, and might be remedied. Captain Bolton saw me several times before that, previous to the arrival of the 'Europe,' and he told me that he was going to inspect the 'Europe' as soon as she arrived home."

The "Europe" was inspected by Captain Bolton and Mr Ramage at Bristol about the beginning of March 1874, and the result was that a sale was concluded to Matheson and Company for £19,000, the sellers undertaking to execute some repairs specified by the inspectors. The manner in which the sale was brought about is thus stated by Mr James Macandrew, a partner of the firm of Matheson and Company, who was examined for the defenders on commission:—"In consequence of what passed between us and Captain Bolton on his return we sent a telegram to Jardine, Matheson, and Company, Shanghai. The telegram was to the effect that the steamer 'Europe' appeared suitable for their purpose, that she was strongly recommended by Mr Denny, and might be had for £19,000. We sent the said telegram as arranged with Captain Bolton, who, I have no doubt, saw its terms before being sent off. . . . Interrogated—Depones, The 'Europe' was on a voyage at this time. We recommended the purchase, subject to after inspection of the vessel. The vessel was afterwards inspected by Captain Bolton and an engineer at Bristol. Their report was satisfactory, and in consequence of their report some repairs were then made upon the vessel. I have no doubt Captain Bolton reported to us that the repairs had been satisfactorily completed, and in consequence we afterwards arranged for payment of the price, £19,000. The vessel, upon payment of the price, which was partly advanced by us, was transferred to my name as nominal owner, and along with the transfer we procured a paper from the Custom-House transferring her registry to the port of Hong Kong, where she was to be entered in the name of one of the partners of Jardine, Matheson, and Company as owners. The ship required to be entered in the name of some one other than the sellers, and we accordingly had the ship transferred for our own security, and with a view to the ultimate transfer of the vessel to the true purchasers. We acted in the transaction merely as agents, our firm not being shipowners. When we advance the purchase-money of a ship we are in the practice of having the vessel transferred to our name, in the first instance, for our security. Interrogated, depones, Neither my said firm nor any partner of it suggested or recommended the purchase of the 'Europe.' The vessel was brought under our notice by Captain Bolton. But for Mr Denny's recommendation the vessel would not have been purchased at all. The vessel was purchased by us for the China Merchants Steam Navigation Company. It had been arranged in China before the purchase was completed that the steamer should be taken by the China Coast Steam Navigation Company instead of the China Merchants Steam Navigation Company. . . . I had no communication with the pursuer in regard to the purchase of the 'Europe' in March. He had nothing to do with the purchase."

No. 161.

July 11, 1876.
White v. Munro, &c.

Upon learning that the steamer had been sold, the pursuer wrote to Mories, Munro, and Company claiming commission, which claim the agents of the owners declined to recognise.

The pursuer led evidence as to the custom of trade on the Clyde and elsewhere in regard to shipbrokers' commission, the result of which is stated in the Sheriff-substitute's note.

The Sheriff-substitute (F. W. Clark), on 16th October 1875, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that on an introduction obtained from the pursuer, followed by negotiations in which the pursuer acted the part of middleman, the defenders ultimately sold the steamship 'Europe' for £18,000 sterling to Matheson and Company of London, and that the defenders, as sellers, are in consequence liable to the pursuer in a reasonable commission, in name of remuneration, or quantum meruit: Finds that the same may, in the present case, be fairly stated at two and a-half per cent., that being the amount claimed in the summons: Therefore, and for the reasons assigned in the subjoined note, decerns against the defenders for the sum of £450 sterling, with interest from the date of citation to this action: Finds the defenders liable to the pursuer in expenses," &c.*

---

* "NOTE.— . . . . . The law in such cases, though perhaps at an early period somewhat ambiguous, may now, it is conceived, be stated as follows:—When a broker first introduces two principals to each other, and that introduction eventuates in a purchase and sale, he earns his commission. Nor does it matter whether he works out the business, or whether the principals complete it without his assistance. See as to this, Green v. Bartlett, May 30, 1863, 14 Scott's C. B. Reports, p. 681, 32 L. J. (N. S.) C. P. 261; Dalton v. Irvine, April 24, 1830, 4 Carrington and Payne's Reports, p. 289; Wilkison v. Martin, Feb. 16, 1837, 8 Carrington and Payne, p. 1; Cunard, &c. v. Van Oppen, 1859, 1 Foster and Finlason, p. 716; Gibson v. Crick, April 17, 1862, 31 L. J. Exch. p. 304.

"In the present case it is plain that the sellers and purchasers were originally brought together by the pursuer, and that for a time he acted as the sole middleman or mutual agent for the parties. That the negotiations for a time broke

No. 161.

July 11, 1876.
White v. Munro, &c

The Sheriff (Dickson) adhered.

The defenders appealed to the Court of Session.

Argued for the defenders;—It was not a correct statement of the facts to say that the vessel was ultimately sold to the same parties to whom the pursuer had introduced the defenders. The introduction was given to Matheson and Company of London, who were acting for Jardine, Matheson, and Company of China, or rather, certain native traders behind them, although Matheson and Company did not disclose their principals. Captain Bolton derived his powers directly from the same authority in China, and had never heard of the pursuer till he got Matheson and Company's letter of 14th January 1874. Matheson and Company acted simply as financial agents of the parties in China to whom the sale was effected. The pursuer was merely incidentally referred to as a person whose agency had failed. The negotiations which resulted in the sale were begun and carried through by Bolton and Denny. If Bolton had never come from China the pursuer would never have earned his commission. The case differed vitally from some of the English cases, in which the broker had been prevented from earning his commission by the parties to the sale taking the business out of his hands. No obstacle was thrown in the way of the pursuer earning his commission. He was functus officio; his intervention had failed; and he had himself intimated its failure to the defenders. So far from the pursuer having conduced to the sale, he and his actings were nothing more than a temporary impediment to the sale, which was ultimately removed. The case was a much less favourable case for the broker than the recent case of Moss v. Cunliffe and Dunlop,[1] for there, beyond question, the broker's introduction led, directly or indirectly, to the sale which was ultimately effected.

Argued for the pursuer;—By the custom of trade, established by the proof, and recognised by the English decisions, commission was due to a shipbroker who introduced a person who had a ship to sell to a buyer, provided that the introduction resulted in a sale, and it made no difference whether or not the broker gave his assistance in arranging the details of the transaction. The sale in the present case was concluded with precisely the same parties to whom the defenders were introduced by the pursuer, viz., Matheson and Company of London, and it was immaterial to the present issue whether Matheson and Company were acting as principals or as agents. Even if the pursuer had nothing to do with the re-opening of the transaction he could not be deprived of the commission which he had earned by his introduction. But in point of fact the parties did again down was no fault of his. At length the same vessel was bought and sold by the same parties through the intervention, no doubt, of a friend of one of them, who disclaims all claim for remuneration; yet even in this last negotiation the pursuer was also engaged, and probably contributed, in no small degree, to its success. To hold that, in such circumstances, he is not entitled to remuneration, would be to reverse alike the custom of trade and the rule of law. The case seems much stronger than many in which custom and rule have been given effect to; and, indeed, if any other view were to prevail it is difficult to see how brokers could claim remuneration at all, inasmuch as it is only when their introductions result in sales that they are allowed any remuneration. It may further be noticed that, in the present case, the pursuer did not let the matter rest on the mere law or trade custom, but specially stipulated with the defenders, at the very outset of the introduction, that if a sale resulted he should claim commission.

---

"About the amount there can be little doubt. From the evidence in process it would seem that 2½ per cent is the ordinary rate in the case of steamers."

[1] Moss v. Cunliffe and Dunlop, March 20, 1875, ante, vol. ii. p. 657.

No. 161.

July 11, 1876.
White v. Munro, &c.

resort to him; he was reinstated in his position of broker. The position of matters was, in short, this:—A break occurred in the negotiations. The intending purchasers thought that the ship would not suit them. They were afterwards persuaded by Captain Bolton to think better of the matter, and they ultimately bought the vessel. The case was thus, in all essential particulars, the same as Mansell v. Clements.[1]

At advising,—

LORD NEAVES.—In this case, which is one of difficulty and subtlety, we are placed at a disadvantage in the way in which we have to deal with it. The foundation of the case is an alleged custom in favour of shipbrokers when introducing a purchaser of a ship to a seller. We have to take our data partly from English decisions, and partly from evidence of the custom in the Clyde. I am prepared to assume that such a custom exists, though not perhaps in the precise terms which the pursuer sets forth in his condescendence (Art. 8)—"By the custom of trade in the Clyde, as elsewhere, a shipbroker in the pursuer's position, negotiating the sale of a steamer, is entitled to commission at 2½ per cent upon the price payable by the seller; and by the same custom, where a broker's introduction and recommendation of a ship conduced, and, taken together with other circumstances, ultimately led to the purchase of the ship, the broker is entitled to fair remuneration as for services rendered."

The facts founded on by the pursuer are these:—He was acting for Matheson and Company of London, who desired to purchase a steamer for friends in China. He wrote the defenders that he had named the "Europe," belonging to them, to Matheson and Company, as likely to suit. After some correspondence the ship was examined on behalf of Matheson and Company, and the report on it was unfavourable. It is clear that a mere talk or negotiation about a sale does not give the broker a right to commission, unless a sale takes place. The question here is, whether the broker has a claim to commission on a sale, which was certainly not negotiated by him, but to which he says in his record his introduction and recommendation, "taken together with other circumstances, ultimately led." The other circumstances that occurred are these:—After bringing the parties together, i.e., the defenders and Matheson and Company, and having had the ship examined by Captain Crockett, and an adverse report obtained, the pursuer, on 7th October 1873, writes the defenders—"The inspector has seen 'Europe,' and does not write a good report of her bottom, so my friends must decline her. I regret this, after all our negotiations and his making the journey to Antwerp." This letter imports that the transaction was broken off by the final declinature of the pursuer's friends, Matheson and Company. The letter is written by the pursuer, the broker, but acting as the channel of communication of Messrs Matheson. His friends, as he terms them, decline the ship, and he himself regrets it, no doubt sincerely. I doubt whether the broker's right to commission could survive this occurrence, unless in special circumstances leading to a reconsideration and withdrawal by Messrs Matheson of the rejection or declinature which had thus been intimated by the pursuer. He had done his best, but he had failed, and he himself intimates the termination of the negotiations without making any attempt or suggestion as to their renewal.

---

[1] Pursuer's Authorities.—Cases cited in Sheriff-substitute's note; also Burnet v. Bouch, July 4, 1840, 9 Carr. and Payne, 620; Inchbald v. The Western Neilgherry Coffee, Tea, and Cinchona Co., Nov. 10, 1864, 34 L. J. (N. S.) C. P. 16; Mansell v. Clements, Jan. 31, 1874, L. R. 9 C. P. 139.

No. 161. July 11, 1876. White v. Munro, &c.

It is a part, no doubt, of the custom of trade alleged, that parties are not to take advantage of a broker's negotiations once opened by them, and, while these are still in dependence, employ another broker to carry through the sale, or to carry the sale through in person so as to oust the broker of the commission which he was in the course of earning. This is justly considered a breach of commercial morality and fairness. But I cannot find any authority for saying that after the broker himself willingly and deliberately intimates that "his friends" decline to purchase the ship, and closes his correspondence with expressions of regret, but without condemning or complaining of the course taken, the sellers are not entitled, without any breach of commercial good faith, to look out for another broker or another channel for selling the ship. That is what here took place. The sellers themselves resorted to Mr Peter Denny, who appears to be a shipbroker. At all events, if he is not, there is nothing to prevent his acting as a shipbroker, and doing so without payment. Denny arranges a sale upon different terms, and the vessel is sold, not, I think, to Messrs Matheson, but in reality to some traders in China, who have some connection with the Mathesons, but came forward themselves at this stage when the proceedings of the Mathesons were broken off.

Now, if there had been a competition between Denny and White, whether Denny was to get the commission on the sale effected by him, or whether White was entitled to commission upon a transaction which he declared himself unable to carry through, there cannot be a doubt that Denny would have been successful. If White were to come forward in a competition with Denny and say, "Matheson and Company, and Mories, Munro, and Company, are my clients; if at any time a sale of the ship is effected between the parties whom I brought together the commission is mine,"—I do not think that such a claim would, in the circumstances that occurred, be covered by the custom condescended on. In one way, no doubt, White conduced to the sale. He did so by retiring from the transaction, and allowing Denny to step in to carry out what he had failed to do. I cannot see what "other circumstances" there are for which White is entitled to take any credit. What Denny had to do was to counteract what White had done, or what was wrongly done under White's regime.

As an illustration: Suppose—by a rather violent supposition—that payment by results were the rule in medical practice,—which it is not likely to be in so thoroughly a liberal profession, I am called in as a medical man, and find that the disease declines to go away under my treatment. I say so, and retire from the case as incurable. Another doctor comes in, and employs a different system, and cures the patient. Could I, the first doctor, say The fee is mine. I was the cause of the ultimate cure. My going away was the cause of your coming, and therefore I was the causa causans of the resulting cure?

The custom must be treated as a reasonable one. I might look with more favour on the claim if I found authority for holding that a broker, who has failed and parted with the transaction as at an end in the manner that here occurred, is still entitled to commission on the ground that his intervention conduced to the ultimate sale through a new broker in circumstances like the present, where the ultimate sale is only effected by the report previously obtained through the medium of the first broker being found bad and got out of the way. In the absence of any such precise or even cognate authority I think the claim cannot be supported.

Further, I doubt whether this was a sale to the same parties whom the pursuer introduced in 1873; at least, if it was, it was so in special circumstances. The true buyers were not Matheson and Company of London, but the men in China for whom they acted as agents. No doubt they furnished the sinews of war, and the vessel was accordingly registered in their name as a security for their advances. But Captain Bolton was ultimately sent out direct by the China Merchants Company with full powers; he did not go to Matheson and Company of London, but went direct to his friend Mr Denny at Dumbarton, who happened by accident to have been applied to by the defenders to get the "Europe," sold. True, after getting the letter of 14th January from Messrs Matheson, Captain Bolton calls upon Mr White. But Mr White was not the cause of the sale. The fact is, that Captain Bolton, being himself a man of skill, threw overboard Captain Crockett's report, and decided to buy the ship in opposition to it. I cannot think that Captain Bolton's constituents were in such circumstances indebted in any way to the pursuer.

Upon the whole, I see no reason why the pursuer, whose intervention was all against the sale, should now be paid a commission, because he retired and made it necessary or desirable to employ another man to come in and put matters right. I think, therefore, that the defenders should be assoilzied.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I do not suppose that any question of difficulty arises as to the pursuer's right to commission in point of law if he has made out his case in point of fact. Such cases are very rare in Scotland; but we had the whole subject fully under our consideration not long since in Moss v. Cunliffe and Dunlop.

I think the question in dispute is well raised in the first letter which the pursuer wrote to Messrs Mories, Munro, and Company. He there says that Messrs Matheson and Company of London are desirous of purchasing a spar-deck steamer, and that he has named the "Europe" to them as likely to suit; and concludes—"In the event of business, which I trust will result, please reserve my commission."

The custom applicable to such matters is that where a broker introduces a person who has a vessel to sell to one who is desirous to buy, and the introduction results in the purchase of the vessel, the broker is entitled to commission. The pursuer states the question fairly enough in the letter which I have referred to. When he speaks in that letter of the business which he trusts will result he can only mean business resulting from his introduction. That, again, raises the question of fact, whether the sale of the ship in question, the "Europe," resulted from the pursuer's introduction.

In dealing with this question, I look, at the outset, to the conclusions of the summons to see what view the pursuer himself took of the facts which he was prepared to prove—(reads the summons, quoted on page 1011).

The most favourable way for the pursuer of treating the summons as so framed is to take a combined view of his two grounds of action, although he libels alternatively. But let us see whether the pursuer has established his case on either conclusion of his summons, or on both of them. Combining what he says he did in the autumn of 1873 with what he says he did in the spring of 1874, can it be maintained on the proof that the purchase of the "Europe" ultimately took place in consequence of his introduction or services. If the pursuer has established that it did he may be entitled to prevail, but not otherwise. I am inclined to think, with my brother Lord Neaves, that he has failed to do so, and I shall shortly state my views of the evidence, which are in substantial accordance with those of his Lordship.

No. 161.
July 11, 1876.
White v. Munro, &c.

In the first place, looking alone to the negotiations which took place in the autumn of 1873 it is impossible to hold on the proof that anything resulted from them. On the contrary, the pursuer says himself, in his letter of 7th October 1873, that his friends must decline the "Europe," and that was the end of the negotiation in the autumn of 1873. If, therefore, the matter had remained there, no question, I should think, could have been raised. The only question is, whether the negotiations now referred to, and which had resulted in no business, were revived and resumed in the spring of 1874 in such a way as to give the pursuer a claim to commission which he would not otherwise have had. This is a somewhat difficult and certainly narrow question on the evidence; but, after careful consideration, I have come to the same conclusion regarding it as Lord Neaves. If negotiations had been resumed between Matheson and Company of London and the defenders, and a sale of the ship had ultimately taken place to Matheson and Company, the pursuer might perhaps have been entitled to commission, notwithstanding the interval of time which elapsed, and notwithstanding the breaking off in October of the autumn negotiations. But that is not the state of the facts. The pursuer's connection with the matter must, I think, be held to have terminated in October, and the subsequent negotiations in the spring of 1874 were by other parties altogether and entirely independent of him. Captain Bolton wrote from China on 6th November 1873 to his friend Mr Peter Denny at Dumbarton that he is coming to this country to "see after the building of two steamers for the China Merchants Company." He accordingly comes to this country, and in the beginning of 1874 goes down to Dumbarton. And it is very important to keep in view that Captain Bolton, who had plenary powers from his constituents in China, when he went to Dumbarton, knew nothing whatever of any previous negotiation in regard to the "Europe." He put himself in communication with Mr Denny; and by a singular coincidence, when Captain Bolton told Mr Denny the kind of ship he wanted, that gentleman stated that a ship—the "Europe"—had been placed in his hands for sale which he thought would suit. Negotiations accordingly proceeded between Bolton and Denny, who is designed as a shipbroker in the proof. A meeting also took place between Bolton, Denny, and the defender Munro, the latter acting for the other defenders, his partner Mr Mories being now dead, and we have the result in Bolton's letter of 13th January 1874, written in a tone and in terms which unequivocally indicate that previous to his meeting with Denny he had had no communication whatever either with Matheson and Company or the pursuer about the "Europe." I take it as a fact that neither Bolton nor Denny knew anything of the previous negotiations, and what is of equal importance is the fact that the defender Munro had no idea at that time that Bolton was negotiating for the purchase of a vessel for the same parties for whom Matheson and Company had been previously negotiating. I do not say that a binding and concluded contract of sale of the "Europe" was at this date entered into between the defender and Bolton through the medium of Denny, but these parties had certainly agreed to all the essentials of such a contract, subject to the approval of Bolton's constituents in China, and an inspection of the ship when she came into port. It was at this point of time, upon Matheson and Company getting Bolton's letter, that they found he was after the same vessel which had been previously reported upon unfavourably. They wrote Bolton to this effect. Their letter leaves Bolton in some doubt as to whether the ship would suit. However, it appears that he decided to proceed with the inspection of the vessel. In the meantime, while the vessel is on her way to a home port, he calls upon Mr White, the pursuer, in London. The only evidence as to what took place is given by the pursuer, Mr White, himself. If what took place between him and Bolton is a necessary part of the pursuer's case, I cannot think there is sufficient evidence of it. There is no corroboration of his evidence, for Bolton has not been examined as a witness at all. But what was it that took place according to the pursuer's own account? He says that Bolton spoke of Crockett's report, which was unfavourable, upon which "I told Captain Bolton that I thought the 'Europe' was a very suitable vessel for him, and that I understood the objections Captain Crockett made to her were slight, and might be remedied. Captain Bolton saw me several times before that previous to the arrival of the 'Europe,' and he told me that he was going to inspect the 'Europe' as soon as she arrived home." That was the nature and import of the communications which passed, so far as we can see, between Bolton and the pursuer. I am unable to hold them to be sufficient to shew that there was such a revival or resumption of the negotiations with the pursuer as to entitle him to the commission claimed by him. Bolton learned nothing from the pursuer beyond what he knew before, viz., that Crockett had reported on the ship, and that the report was unfavourable. I cannot therefore hold that White's introduction in 1873 led to the sale of the vessel, or that White had anything to do with the sale which ultimately took place in 1874, and in support of this view it is of importance to bear in mind that Mr James Macandrew, one of the partners of Matheson and Company, says distinctly in his evidence,—"I had no communication with the pursuer in regard to the purchase of the 'Europe' in March. He had nothing to do with that purchase."

I am far from saying that if there had been any evidence of an attempt or purpose by the parties, through and by whom the "Europe" was ultimately bought, to defraud or deprive the pursuer of his commission after he had fairly earned it, the case would have assumed a totally different aspect, and the pursuer might have prevailed. But clearly no such purpose was formed, and no such attempt made. Accordingly the pursuer did not represent his case on the proof in that light at all.

Nor does it make any difference that Mr Denny, through whom the sale was effected, has not claimed commission. To test the present dispute: Let it be supposed that Denny had been employed in the ordinary way by the defenders, on finding they could not sell the ship through the medium of the pursuer, and that the ship was sold through the medium and agency of Denny, as it unquestionably was, and that a competition had arisen between Denny and White as to which of them was entitled to commission,—in that case I cannot doubt but that Denny would be preferred.

For the reasons I have now stated it appears to me that the pursuer has failed to establish his claim, and that the interlocutor of the Sheriff should be recalled, and the defenders assoilzied.

No. 161. July 11, 1876. White v. Munro, &c.

LORD GIFFORD.—This is an action by a shipbroker in London against the owners and sellers of the steamship "Europe," to recover commission claimed by the pursuer on the price of the ship received by the defenders, the vendors.

The pursuer, Mr White, never was employed by the defenders, the owners of the ship, but it seems to be the custom that when a shipbroker is employed by a party who desires to purchase a ship, and where, under that employment, the shipbroker succeeds in finding a suitable vessel for his client, and where a purchase of it is concluded, the broker demands and receives his commission, not from his own client, the purchaser, but from the vendors of the ship to whom he has introduced the purchasers, this introduction or the shipbroker's agency having been the means of effecting the sale.

I cannot say that this custom, about which, however, there was no dispute at the bar, is one entirely to be approved and commended. I should think it would be much more healthy and wholesome in such trade that a broker should look for his remuneration to his own employer, and that his commission, at whatever rate it may be fixed, should be expressly charged as such, and not wrapped up and included, as seems to be the practice, in the price of the vessel. It is always best that everything should wear its own name, and that the truth of each transaction should distinctly appear. The custom in question practically leads to this, that the vendor simply adds to his minimum price the commission which he knows he will have to pay to the purchaser's broker, and possibly, if this is distinctly known and universally understood, it may not lead to any serious mischief, though I confess I could wish that the custom were otherwise.

In the present case, in Mr White's first letter to the owners of the "Europe," in which he informs them that Messrs Matheson and Company are desirous of purchasing a steamer, and that he has named the "Europe" as a likely ship, he concludes thus—"In the event of business, which I trust will result, please reserve my commission," that is, add to the nett price which you are willing to accept my commission, which we see otherwise was 2½ per cent.

So far there is no dispute between the parties, and if the "Europe" had been sold to the pursuer's clients, Messrs Matheson, in consequence of the pursuer's introduction, that is, in consequence of the pursuer having suggested the "Europe" to Messrs Matheson as a likely ship, it is not disputed that the defenders, the vendors of the "Europe," would have had to pay the pursuer his commission. And most justly so, for if the transaction had gone on in its expected course the vendors would have added to their own price, that is, to the nett price which they were to receive, 2½ per cent, for the very purpose of paying it over to the pursuer as the purchaser's broker.

But the real question in the present case is one of fact, Did the ultimate sale of the "Europe" by the defenders take place in consequence of the pursuer's introduction, that is, in consequence of the pursuer, as Messrs Matheson's broker, having introduced the defenders to them, or in consequence of the pursuer's having suggested the "Europe" as a ship likely to suit, or in consequence of anything whatever done by the pursuer as a shipbroker, or as an intermediary of any kind? To use the pursuer's own language in his very first letter, Did

No. 161.
July 11, 1876.
White v. Munro, &c.

"business result" from the pursuer's brokerage, or from anything that the pursuer had done or might do, in which case only, as the pursuer himself says, the defenders are to reserve, that is, add on to their price the pursuer's commission. If the ultimate sale did not result from the pursuer's brokerage or agency, but was entirely and exclusively due to something else with which the pursuer had no concern whatever—if the pursuer's agency was absolutely terminated and at an end, it may be by the pursuer's own act, by his dissuading from the purchase and substituting some other vessel, if new negotiations had to be opened after a lapse of time and by another broker who took different views from the pursuer or gave different advice, and if the ultimate purchase resulted from a change of circumstances and a new intervention in no way attributable to the pursuer, if, in short, to use the words of Chief-Justice Erle, the pursuer is in no sense the causa causans of the sale, then whatever claim he may have against his own clients for abortive work done, it is difficult to see how he can have any claim upon the vendors who never employed him, who were not his clients, and who have taken nothing whatever—it may be only injury and prejudice—by his intervention.

Of course if there was anything like mala fides on the part of anybody, either vendor or purchaser, if there was any attempt to defeat or cut out the pursuer from a justly earned commission, if there were even grounds for suspecting collusion or the possibility that the parties were combining to throw over the pursuer, the case would be very different, but it was admitted on all hands that in the present case there was not the faintest colour for such an imputation—that all parties to the present suit have acted throughout in optima fide and with perfect honour and fairness, as indeed might be expected from their high standing and reputation, and whatever be the result of the pursuer's claim, whether he succeed or fail, it will not be on the ground of any unfairness or impropriety imputable to any of the parties.

Now, then, what resulted from the introduction effected by the pursuer, that is, from his introducing Messrs Matheson to the owners of the "Europe," and suggesting the "Europe" as likely to suit Messrs Mathesons' views? Particulars of the "Europe" were furnished by the pursuer, negotiations were opened, and some correspondence took place. A survey was resolved upon when the vessel should arrive at Antwerp, and apparently through the pursuer's arrangement a Captain Crockett was sent to Antwerp to survey and inspect the vessel. Captain Crockett reached Antwerp on 6th October 1873, and apparently made his inspection and report the same day. His report is No. 14/10 of process, 6th October 1873. The report gives various particulars, and apparently suggests various faults or defects of the "Europe," and he concludes in these words:—"Above all, judging from the state of her bottom, would have nothing to do with her." No doubt he adds "her boilers and engines are reported as very good," but these he had not inspected, or got inspected by any one, and I cannot help drawing the conclusion that he did not go on with such inspection because, in his opinion, the state of the vessel's bottom was conclusive against her. He "would have nothing to do with her." Captain Crockett's report was communicated to Messrs Matheson, and apparently through them to the pursuer, Mr White, and next day the pursuer writes to the defenders or their then authors (No. 8/2 of process),—"Dear Sirs—The inspector has seen 'Europe,' and does not write a good report of her bottom, so my friends must decline her. I regret this after all our negotiations and his making the journey to Antwerp."

No. 161. July 11, 1876. White v. Munro, &c.

Pausing here for a moment, I think nothing can be clearer that at this point the negotiation was, at least for the time, and I say no more at present, completely closed, and closed in perfect good faith. We have it under the pursuer's own hand—"my friends must decline" the vessel; and he gives the reason—the unfavourable report of the inspector. The matter is shut—the vessel won't suit—the Mathesons are to look elsewhere, and there, at least for the present, the matter closes. No doubt it might have been re-opened—the pursuer himself might have suggested that some farther inquiry should be made instead of acting at once on Captain Crockett's report, or the owners of the "Europe" might have remonstrated against Captain Crockett's report, or challenged its correctness, or tabled a counter report, or insisted that the ship's bottom was faultless, or in any other way continued, or even after a considerable interval resumed, the negotiations. If this had happened, or if anything approaching to this had happened, I am clear that the original introduction would still subsist, and if business ultimately resulted the pursuer's commission would be due.

Nothing whatever of this kind took place—the pursuer's own letter absolutely closed the negotiation. All parties acquiesced therein—nobody whispered that Captain Crockett might have been mistaken, and so far as Messrs Matheson were concerned the "Europe" passed out of their market. Their constituents in China might still require a vessel, but the "Europe" would not do—she had been tried and found wanting.

It was suggested that the "Europe" had been declined, not because she was unsuitable, but because the same day (7th October 1873) Messrs Matheson had got a telegram from China, dated 7th, which is read as instructions not to buy at all till further orders. We have not the letters referred to in the telegram, but I do not see any ground for the suggestion that this telegram was the true cause of the rejection of the "Europe." It certainly was not the assigned cause, which Mr White states quite expressly, and it is hardly suggested that Messrs Matheson would instruct their broker to give a reason different from the true one. It is not shewn that the private telegrams to Messrs Matheson were communicated to Mr White, at least at the time when he in the best of faith intimated the rejection of the "Europe," and its reason, to the defenders. In short, I hardly think the pursuer himself would deliberately suggest that the rejection was not a real and bona fide rejection, but only an ostensible and pretended one. One thing is clear—it was a perfectly clear and conclusive rejection so far as the defenders were concerned, and they acquiesced in it as such. They did not farther press, or press at all, the "Europe" on the attention of Messrs Matheson as proposed purchasers.

After this nothing whatever happened, so far as the "Europe" is concerned, till 13th January 1874, a period of upwards of three months. Of course the "Europe" was still in the market, and so far as those interested in her were concerned purchasers were being sought for, but the owners never thought of Messrs Matheson under the pursuer's introduction. Messrs Matheson had examined and finally rejected her, and her owners had never heard, and probably never thought, either of them or of the pursuer since that rejection. It is no doubt also true that the Chinese constituents of Messrs Matheson were still in want of steamers, and their wants had not yet been supplied, but of this the owners of the "Europe" knew nothing, and probably cared nothing, seeing that the "Europe" would not do. The China company were looking after other sellers than the defenders, and the defenders must find other purchasers than Messrs Matheson, and so the matter stood for more than three months.

In the meantime, and in January 1874, the China company, instead of continuing to employ Messrs Matheson of London to find a ship by means of a broker (and the pursuer had been the broker whom Messrs Matheson of London had selected), send home from China their own agent, Captain Bolton, to buy or build steamers. The Shanghai letter, advising Captain Bolton's mission to Messrs Matheson (6th November 1873) bears:—"It will be of interest to you to know that Captain Bolton is at present here in communication with the manager of the Chinese company; and we think it likely that, in the course of a week or two, he will be authorised to proceed home with full powers to build or purchase, with your assistance, one or more boats, of such character as may be decided upon." * These were his powers, and he came to Messrs Matheson thus accredited. It is said Captain Bolton had no power to conclude a purchase, and that the expression "full powers" only meant that he was to inquire and assist Messrs Matheson, who after all were to be the only purchasers. I confess I can hardly read the expression "full powers to build or purchase" in so limited a sense, and I incline to think that the words "with your assistance" mean that Messrs Matheson, as the London correspondents of Messrs Jardine and Company of Shanghai, are to find the funds, while Captain Bolton, as the man of skill on whom Jardine and Company relied, is to choose, fix, and approve the vessel. But however this may be, Captain Bolton had certainly full powers by himself alone, and without the intervention of Messrs Matheson, to search for, discover, or find out suitable vessels, examine them, and ultimately approve them or select them as fit for his constituents' purposes, and accordingly he actually did so without the assistance or intervention of Messrs Matheson. No doubt he was in communication with Messrs Matheson, but it was not on their advice or instructions, but of his own accord, and acting for his Chinese constituents, that he came down to the Clyde in January to look for steamers, or, if he could not find them, to select builders to construct new ones.

Now, what resulted from Captain Bolton's search in the Clyde? It is not pretended that Captain Bolton was sent by the pursuer or had ever heard of him. It clearly appears from Captain Bolton's letters that before coming to the Clyde he had never heard of the "Europe," and I think it may be taken that he came down to the Clyde free and unfettered to choose a steamer wherever she might be found. In the course of his search Captain Bolton called, among others, upon Mr Denny, shipbroker, Dumbarton, not in virtue of any introduction from the pursuer or even the Messrs Matheson, but as appears from Captain Bolton's own letter of 6th November preceding, in consequence of instructions from Mr Tongking Sing of China, who, it appears, had also written to Mr Denny on the subject, and to whom, that is, to Tongking Sing, estimates were to be wired for decision. Captain Bolton's first meeting with Mr Denny was on 13th January 1874, when Mr Denny, in his capacity of shipbroker and as a skilled person acquainted with Clyde shipping, went into the matter and ascertained all Captain Bolton's requirements for second-hand ships. The result was that, after full communication and consultation, Mr Denny, the Dumbarton ship-

* This letter was followed by that of 13th November 1873, partially quoted in the narrative, p. 1012.

No. 161.

July 11, 1876.
White v.
Munro, &c.

broker, to use his own words, "stated to Captain Bolton that a ship had been placed in my hands for sale, which I considered in every way well adapted for the purpose. This ship I stated was the 'Europe,' belonging to Mories, Munro, and Company." Now, observe Denny was an independent shipbroker, who had never heard of the present pursuer in connection with the "Europe." Bolton was an accredited agent direct from China, with full powers to effect, or at least to negotiate, a purchase. In the ordinary course of business, and without the pursuer having anything whatever to do with it, Denny and Bolton came together. Denny is a shipbroker who has been directly employed by the owners of the "Europe" to try to sell their ship, and in ordinary circumstances if he sells her he will get his commission from his own clients, the present defenders. The seller of the ship always pays commission to the broker who effects or causes the sale. No doubt it is true that in the present case Denny happened to be a personal friend of the owners, and from considerations of friendship and a regard to the circumstances of the family of a deceased partner, who were owners of two-thirds, he had agreed to act gratuitously, that is, to waive his claim for commission against the vendors, in other words, to make them a present of his commission. But this does not in the least alter the case so far as regards the present pursuer. Denny in any question with the pursuer must be taken as an independent broker, earning and entitled to his commission, and it is very startling to be told, taking the facts even so far as I have now gone, that Denny will never be entitled to earn or to receive any commission even if he succeeds in selling the "Europe" to Captain Bolton acting for his Chinese constituents, because more than three months before the pursuer, Mr White, a broker 500 miles away, of whom he never heard, had named the "Europe" to Messrs Matheson, who, after a regular survey, had definitely and conclusively rejected her, of all which proceedings neither Captain Bolton nor Mr Denny knew anything whatever.

It is suggested that Mr Denny was not a broker, and had no power to sell without his constituents, the present defenders, and it is said that it does not appear when or how long before the 13th January the defenders had put the "Europe" "into Denny's hands for sale." But surely it cannot be doubted that Denny was acting purely and solely as a shipbroker, and as to his powers, why, Munro, the surviving partner of the defenders' firm, was specially brought to the consultations with Captain Bolton, and gave on the spot, if he had not done it before, full authority for the sale. If the present action had been at Denny's instance to get his commission from the defenders they could not for a moment have denied his authority. It can make no difference whatever that Denny, instead of charging commission in the ordinary way, is generously waiving it in favour of his personal friends. Nay, the circumstance tells the other way, for it is in evidence and undisputed in point of fact that the vendors in fixing the price had specially in view the fact that Denny was to charge no commission, and therefore that the price stipulated would not be subject to any deduction. In short, if Denny had charged commission the defenders, to use the pursuer's phrase, would have "reserved it," that is, they would have added it on, or as much of it as they could obtain, to the price demanded, or otherwise have declined to sell for a lesser sum.

The arrangement between Captain Bolton, Denny, and the defenders was of course conditional. The ship was at sea, and was to be inspected and surveyed on arrival. This was part of the bargain, and besides it had to be wired to China for approval, but if everything was favourable the parties were agreed both as to price and subject, and this result, with all particulars, Captain Bolton announces to Messrs Matheson of London by his letter of that same evening (13th January 1874). It is only on receipt of this letter that an obstacle arises, for it is really an obstacle, and a very serious obstacle to the proposed sale. Messrs Matheson at once say to Captain Bolton—Why, this "Europe" that you have found out, and which you think so suitable and propose to buy, is the very vessel which we, acting on Captain Crockett's report, finally rejected more than three months ago. This will never do; we send you Captain Crockett's report. It is as if they had added—For any sake do not buy the "Europe." Of course this objection led to inquiries. Denny was consulted, and he said—I do not consider Captain Crockett an authority—I recommend a better survey from a more trustworthy person. Buy upon your own survey, and never mind Captain Crockett. And Denny succeeded in his view. He persuaded Captain Bolton and the Mathesons too to throw Captain Crockett's report overboard; to take a new and independent surveyor, and instead of following Captain Crockett's advice and have nothing to do with the "Europe," to buy her on the terms proposed at the meeting of 13th January, before Captain Crockett was heard of. And Mr Denny was successful in his efforts. He carried through the sale in spite of Captain Crockett, and notwithstanding the pursuer's declinature; for although it is perfectly true that the present pursuer was not to blame for Captain Crockett's unfavourable report, it is not the less true that he acted upon that report, and for himself and his constituents rejected the ship.

And now, when a new bargain is completed, with new and independent initiation, after new and independent negotiation through a new broker, and new surveyors, who have succeeded, it may be with difficulty, in overcoming the obstacles which the pursuer quite innocently, but not less really, was the means of interposing, when the pursuer's failure and resignation of the enterprise has been followed by a new inception and a successful completion of the enterprise by stronger hands and under better auspices, is it to be said that Denny, the successful negotiator, is to hand over his commission to the pursuer, of whom he never heard, and who did nothing but fail, and, however innocently or honourably, rear up an obstacle in Denny's way? I cannot help thinking this is the real question. Suppose the defenders had "reserved" and were ready to pay the commission, and that the pursuer and Denny were competing for it, the questions would be: By which of them was the sale brought about? Who was the efficient or real cause thereof? The answer to my mind is not doubtful. To Denny, and to Denny alone, of these competing brokers, is the sale due. To use the words of Chief-Justice Erle, Denny alone is the causa causans of the sale, and if I must give a name to the pursuer, it certainly would not be causa causans, but rather impedimentum obstans. If Denny chooses to hand over his commission as a present to his friends that is surely no reason for the pursuer claiming it, especially as the price has been fixed on the footing that Mr Denny would waive his commission. I am therefore for recalling the Sheriffs' judgments, and assoilzieing the defenders.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I differ from the judgment your Lordships propose, and I agree with the result arrived at by both the Sheriffs in the Court below. I attach more than usual weight to the views of these learned Judges in the present case, because it is one which depends entirely on mercantile custom and usages with which their position in a great commercial centre makes them necessarily familiar. I am also impressed by the evidence which has been led in regard to the understanding of merchants in this matter, which cannot be regarded as mere opinions by unskilled witnesses on matters of legal right, but is the indication and outcome of the custom on which alone the case depends, and which no man of sense in practical affairs would disregard. Still, I should not have thought it necessary to enter a formal dissent had I differed only on matters of fact or evidence. But I do not see my way to the result at which your Lordships have arrived without appearing to give my assent to some legal propositions which I think erroneous, and which may hereafter be misleading.

No. 161.
July 11, 1876.
White v. Munro, &c.

There lay at the root of much of the argument addressed to us, both in this case and in the former case of Moss v. Cunliffe and Dunlop,[1] a notion that a claim of this nature was not of a character legitimately professional, and that it ought to be judged of strictly, if not viewed with suspicion. There also seemed to prevail an idea that if such a claim could be put forward by a broker a similar demand could be made by any friend or acquaintance or stranger who might happen to give useful information on similar topics. But such views proceed on a want of familiarity with the kind of transaction in hand. The pursuer follows an occupation which has sprung up from the exigencies of our immense commercial concerns. He makes it his business to know, in the shipbuilding trade, which of the builders or merchants are desirous of finding customers or purchasers, and which are desirous of purchasing or giving orders. These, of course, are constantly varying, and it is found convenient, for those who are largely occupied, to have recourse to such middlemen, instead of looking out for themselves. The sole business of such brokers is to find a possible customer for the seller, and a possible seller for the merchant, just as a man who keeps a register for servants informs his customers who they are who wish to be engaged, and who the employers are who are anxious to engage. With the after negotiations and contract the broker has no concern, nor has he any responsibility in regard to them. If the principals come to one, and business ensues, he has his commission from the seller on the first transaction, if there be no special transaction in view, on the special transaction, if there be one in view. If nothing ensues, he has no claim. In all this there is nothing but an ordinary contract of employment for a particular service, resting, like a great many such contracts, on a well-defined usage, and limited and qualified by the custom on which it rests.

A great authority, Chief-Justice Erle, whom every jurist must respect, said in one of the cases in a claim of this kind,[2] that the broker's introduction must be the causa causans of the ultimate transaction. I agree that there must be the relation of antecedent and consequent between them, and that an incidental or indirect result will not be sufficient. But this remark has, I think, been misapplied. In accurate language an introduction of one person to another with a view to a contract never can be said to be the causa causans of the contract. Its causes lie elsewhere. It is enough in such a claim that the introduction produces negotiation, and that negotiation is followed by a concluded contract.

All this is not directly disputed; but the main consideration which, I think, has been rather lost sight of in the present case, and on which my dissent pro-

[1] March 20, 1875, ante, vol. ii. p. 657.
[2] Green v. Bartlett, May 30, 1863, 32 L. J. C. P. 261, 14 Scott's C. B. Rep. 681.

No. 161.
July 11, 1876.
White v. Munro, &c.

ceeds, is, that the broker undertakes introduction only, not negotiation. When the principals, or those who act for them, are once brought together, the commission is earned if business ensues. The negotiation may undergo numberless vicissitudes, and may be terminated and resumed many times, as such negotiations frequently are, without in any degree affecting the claim of the broker, if the principals come to one at last. The intending purchaser may take all manner of opinions as to the merits of the vessel recommended to him, and the intending seller may inquire as to the price he should demand, or the solvency of the customer, or any other particulars. The seller may decline the transaction to-day, because the money offered is too little, but he may take it to-morrow. Captain Crockett may advise the purchaser one day that the vessel is unsuitable, and the purchaser may terminate the negotiation; but the next day Mr Denny may tell him that the vessel is a good one, and he may on that ground resume the negotiation. The purchaser may decline the bargain through Mr Matheson in October; he may resume it through Captain Bolton in January. All these things, and their causes, proximate or remote, do not affect the broker's claim in any way. His part was done when he informed the parties of their respective desires; and the only further question in which he is interested is, does the negotiation ultimately terminate in a purchase.

Now, how does the present case stand? Shortly stated, thus: Jardine, Matheson, and Company of Shanghai wanted a steamer for a Chinese constituent, and authorised their correspondents, Matheson and Company of London, to purchase one. Matheson and Company, in September 1873, applied to the pursuer, White, a London broker, and he informed the defenders, Munro and Company, that he knew a customer who might purchase their steamer "Europe," and the parties accordingly commenced a negotiation for a purchase. In January 1874 the negotiation terminated in a sale, and Jardine, Matheson, and Company purchased through Matheson and Company of London this same steamer "Europe" from Munro and Company for their Chinese constituent. The pursuer applied for his commission from the seller, and was refused, on the ground that although the negotiation had terminated in a sale, and both parties had received what they wanted, yet at one time the negotiation had been broken off, because Captain Crockett thought and reported unfavourably of the vessel, and that it was only afterwards resumed when it was found that Mr Denny of Dumbarton thought favourably of it. I am at a loss to see what relevancy there is in this statement. That the negotiation was commenced, broken off, resumed, and carried to a conclusion between the same parties is certain. The grounds which induced the parties to alter their minds can be of no consequence. The only thing of importance is the result.

In this view the episode of Captain Bolton's mission, and his communications with the defenders and Denny, are immaterial. Bolton was only, as Matheson was, the representative of the original party to the negotiation, Jardine, Matheson, and Company of Shanghai, and his part in the transaction only explains how it came that the negotiation which was broken off in October was resumed in January. It is said, perhaps truly, that when Bolton first met Munro and Denny at Dumbarton he knew nothing of the former proceedings in regard to this vessel. Munro certainly took care not to mention them, and what Bolton's own knowledge was we cannot tell, because he is not called, neither is his absence accounted for. But it seems of no moment if it be so, because the parties were precisely the same, the subject of negotiation the same, and the object of it the same; and when this was discovered Munro and Jardine's house stood in relation to each other, as regarded this transaction, just as they had done in October previously.

No. 161. July 11, 1876. White v. Munro, &c.

All this seems irrelevant to the main question, and I should have thought it so even if the pursuer had taken no part in any of the negotiations for the purchase, which, as I have said, did not enter into the service by which his commission was earned. In point of fact he did much more. He employed Crockett to report on the vessel, and communicated the result to the defender. But these things he did at Matheson's desire, on account of Jardine's house. It was no part of his action as broker, and can have no more effect on his claim than if Jardine had done them himself. It is not of much consequence to the case, but it is plain that on the 7th of October Matheson's mandate was recalled or suspended, and that was probably not without its influence in stopping the negotiation with Munro at that time. But when Matheson heard from Bolton that he was again on the track of the "Europe," he did what any sensible man would have done in the circumstances, and sent Bolton at once to White, the broker. The pursuer accordingly took the matter up where he had left it three months before. He had all the information regarding the former inquiry; he had over eight meetings on the subject with Bolton; and at last it was resolved to have the vessel into a graving dock, and have her thoroughly examined. The result of that inquiry was that on the 14th March 1874 Matheson of London wrote the final offer to purchase the vessel to Munro and Company. There was no bargain, nor was there the semblance of a bargain until then. Munro was as free to decline the offer as Matheson was to make it. Munro accepted it; and thus the negotiation terminated in a sale betwixt Munro of Greenock and Jardine's house of Shanghai, of the vessel in regard to which the introduction which commenced the negotiation had been given. I think the pursuer has well earned his commission, and that Munro had no more reason for refusing it in January 1875 than he would have had in October 1874.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find in point of fact that the sale which was ultimately effected by the defenders and appellants of the steamship 'Europe' was not a consequence of the introduction by the pursuer and respondent or of anything done by him: Find that the pursuer's introduction and agency did not conduce to the ultimate sale, as libelled by the pursuer; and find in point of law that the pursuer is not entitled to charge commission against the defenders: Therefore sustain the appeal, recall the judgment appealed against, and assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions of the summons, and decern: Find the defenders entitled to expenses in both Courts," &c.

WEBSTER & WILL, S.S.C.—RONALD, RITCHIE, & ELLIS, W.S.—Agents.

No. 162.

July 14, 1876.
Baroness Gray v. Richardson and Others.

BARONESS GRAY, Pursuer.—D.-F. Watson—Johnstone.
SIR JOHN S. RICHARDSON, Bart., Defender.—Balfour—J. P. B. Robertson.
REV. ARCHIBALD FLEMING and MRS FLEMING, Defenders.—Lee—Gloag—Asher.

Property—Title to Lands and Fishings—Runrig and Rundale—Kavels.—Circumstances in which held—1st, That the title of two parties, each to one-half of an estate held in kavels by way of runrig or rundale, was not pro indiviso but separate and exclusive property, and continued to be so after the kavels were massed together and the whole divided into two continuous portions by decreet-arbitral; 2d, That the title to the salmon and other fishings ex adverso of what had been the respective kavels of the two proprietors was separate and exclusive, and not pro indiviso subsequent to the date of the decreet-arbitral, but opinions equally divided as to whether the title to the fishings had ever been otherwise than separate and exclusive.

In 1655 A stood vested under the Crown in the whole lands of Inchyra, situated on the north bank of the Tay, with the salmon and other fishings belonging thereto. In that year A disponed to the predecessor of the pursuer, B, "the just and equal sunny half" of these lands as then possessed by two parties named, "together with the just and equal half of the salmon-fishings of the said lands of Inchyra;" and to the predecessor of the defenders, C and D, A disponed the other half of the same lands, described as consisting of two quarters, and possessed by himself and another party named, "with the just and equal half of the salmon-fishings and other fishings of the said lands of Inchyra." The description of each half was continued in the same terms throughout the subsequent titles of the respective parties, and so appeared in their existing investitures.

The lands of Inchyra consisted of between 400 and 500 Scotch acres, parcelled out into upwards of 100 lots or portions called kavels, of different sizes, some 35 acres, some 10, but the greater part not exceeding 4 or 5 acres, and in this form a number of the kavels reached down to the banks of the river. In place of each of A's two disponees getting one continuous half of the estate the kavels were alloted, one to each alternately, in regular succession, by way of runrig or rundale, and continued to be so possessed till 1795, when, under a joint submission, a decreet-arbitral was obtained, massing all the kavels together and dividing the whole into two continuous halves, but without any change being made on the terms of the feudal titles.

The submission on which this decreet-arbitral proceeded, and likewise the decreet-arbitral itself, reserved "to both parties the right of salmon-fishings on the river Tay respectively belonging to them according to their present boundaries," which were not to be affected by any division of the lands, but the arbiters were empowered to put in march-stones to mark these boundaries, which they did.

These fishings were fourteen or fifteen in number. There had never been any pro indiviso possession either of the lands or fishings (although the peculiar position of one of the fishings had necessitated some peculiarity in its occupancy). Each proprietor had always exercised the exclusive right of fishing ex adverso of his own kavels, and continued to do so as formerly between the date of the decreet-arbitral of 1795 and the date of raising the action in 1874.

Held (unanimously, differing from the Lord Ordinary), that the title to the lands was not a pro indiviso title, but that each of the parties had all along a sole and separate title to one-half of the lands.

Held (also unanimously, and differing from the Lord Ordinary) that the proprietors of the different kavels had a separate and exclusive right to the fishings ex adverso of their respective kavels (and consequently that B was entitled to the fishing more immediately in dispute)—Lord Deas and Lord Mure being of opinion that the dispositions of 1655, construed by the possession which had followed on them, constituted, ab origine, a sole and exclusive title in each proprietor to the fishings ex adverso of his own kavels; and the Lord

No. 162.
July 14, 1876.
Baroness Gray v. Richardson and Others.

President and Lord Ardmillan being of opinion that the title to the fishings had been originally pro indiviso, but that it was to be presumed that the parties had agreed when the decreet-arbitral was pronounced to treat the title in future as separate and exclusive.

Runrig and Rundale—Property, division of.—Observations (per Lord Deas) explanatory of the law and practice of dividing an estate by way of runrig or rundale into two halves, called the sunny half and the shady half.

Salmon-Fishings—Crown grant.—A grant of salmon-fishings having been followed by possession so far as the fishings were available for the time, and the Crown having had no adverse possession, held that the Crown could not, cum effectu, make a grant to a different party of part of the fishings within the bounds of the original grant, although that part had not hitherto been fished, and had only now become available for being so.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Mackenzie. B.

THIS case involved questions of great interest and importance to the law and practice of feudal conveyancing, as well as to the parties, but the material facts are so fully developed in the Lord Ordinary's note and the opinions of the Judges, particularly in the opinion delivered by Lord Deas, that a short introductory statement will suffice to make the questions discussed and decided intelligible.

In and prior to 1655 Sir Alexander Blair stood vested under the Crown in all and whole the lands of Inchyra, and the miln and miln lands thereof, with the salmon and other fishings of the said lands of Inchyra, houses, buildings, &c.

On 16th June 1655 Sir Alexander sold and disponed to William Blair (the predecessor of the pursuer, Lady Gray), "All and Haill the just and equal sunie half of all and haill the town and lands of Inchriff, now commonly called Inchyra, with houses, biggings," &c., "as the same is presentlie occupyed and possessed by Andro Lyell and Allan Peat, with the just and equall halff of the miln of the said lands of Inchyra, miln lands, multures, and sequels thereof, together with the just and equal halff of the salmond-fishinges and uthers fishinges of the saidis landes of Inchyra, and all and haill the passage upone the water of Tay called the ferry, with the ferry boates, privileges, and commodities thereof."

On 2d August, same year, Sir Alexander sold and disponed the other half of the lands of Inchyra to his brother, Andrew Blair, and his wife, and the heirs-male of their marriage (the predecessors of the defenders Mr and Mrs Fleming) under the following description, viz.—"All and haill that quarter or fourt part of the towne and lands of Inchyra, with the houses, biggings," &c., "last occupyet be James Blair and now by myself," and sicklike "all and haill the other quarter or fourt part of all and haill the saidis towne and lands of Inchyra, with houses, biggings, pendicles, and pertinents thereof, presently possessed by Gilbert Lyell, my tennent, with the just and equal half of the mylne of Inchyra, mylne lands, multures, and sequels of the samen used and wont, with the just and equal half of the salmond-fishings and other fishings of the saidis lands of Inchyra, and all and haill that malt barn, keill, and coubill, presentlie possessed by the said Gilbert Lyell, and all and haill these houses and yards of Inchyra, presently possessed by Francis Jack."

The description of each half remained the same in the existing investiture of each of the parties respectively as in their respective dispositions of 1655, and had been so throughout the progress of each from that date downwards—the half belonging to the Flemings being, however, in the interval erected into a barony called the barony of Inchyra, by charter in favour of their predecessor, Andrew Blair, dated 3d March 1662, and the half belonging to Lady Gray being incorporated into the barony of

No. 162.

July 14, 1876.
Baroness Gray v. Richardson and Others.

Kinfauns by charter in favour of her predecessor, Anne Blair, otherwise Carnegie, dated 28th February 1673. In consequence, apparently, of these erections the name of Inchyra came to be popularly appropriated to the Flemings' half of the lands, although remaining applicable to the whole as formerly on the face of the titles.

It appeared from a reported case between the then proprietors of the two halves of Inchyra, decided on 17th January 1782 (M. 14,151), that prior to that time the lands of Inchyra, which consisted of from 400 to 500 Scots acres, had been entirely parcelled out into lots or portions called kavels, varying in size from under 5 acres to 35 acres, and that each of the halves, in place of being continuous, was made up of an equal number of these kavels—a kavel belonging to the one party always alternating with a kavel belonging to the other party, after the fashion of runrig or rundale. The action, decided in 1782, bore accordingly to be founded on the statute 1695, c. 23, "anent lands lying runrig," the purpose of it being to have the whole kavels massed together and divided into two continuous portions. But the action failed in its object, the Court having held that the statute did not apply to fields or kavels of greater size than 4 acres.

It further appeared from other documents that long before the raising of that action the possession of the parties of their respective halves, in the form of kavels, had been the same as it was at the date of the action, and there seemed to be no room to doubt that it had also been so backwards to the date of the two dispositions granted by Sir Alexander Blair in favour of their respective predecessors in 1655.

Thus stood matters when, in 1794, a submission (following upon a previous contract) was entered into between the then proprietors of the two halves, the object of which (similar to that of the action on the statute 1695, c. 23) was to have the kavels massed together and the whole divided into two continuous portions, by a line running from the Tay to the north boundary of the lands, "reserving always" (as the submission bore) "to both parties the right of the salmon-fishings in the river Tay respectively belonging to them, according to their present boundaries, and which boundaries are not to be affected by any division that may be made in consequence hereof, but that the said arbiters, after such division, shall have power to put in march-stones in the ground belonging to either party to ascertain the boundaries of the salmon-fishings belonging to the parties respectively, which are not to be affected by the said division."

The arbiters accordingly pronounced a decreet-arbitral, dated the 2d and recorded in the Sheriff Court books of Perth 7th November 1795, dividing the whole lands into two portions, and allocating the miln, miln-lands, ferry-boat, and houses, all in manner authorised by the submission. The decreet-arbitral farther bore—"We reserve to the parties submitters the salmon-fishings on the river Tay respectively belonging to them according to their present boundaries, wherein we have infixed march-stones in the ground; and we also reserve to both parties access to their different fishings, and to draw and dry their nets, according to use and wont." The arbiters then found that certain of the fishings, which they specified, belonged to the one party, and certain others to the other party (being those ex adverso of the respective kavels which had belonged to each), and they described the march-stones which they had infixed to mark the boundaries of these fishings; and as regarded the fishing called the Hurle Carle (the nature and position of which was peculiar), they found it to be the joint property of the two parties. These findings were followed by this declaration—"And, in terms of the said submission we do hereby declare that the said fishings shall be enjoyed and possessed according to the rights, custom, and usages heretofore observed by the said parties, their authors and predecessors."

No. 162.
July 14, 1876.
Baroness Gray v. Richardson and Others.

The fishings thus held to belong to the respective parties had been all along possessed by each of them respectively. It was not alleged that any of these fishings, except, it might be, the Hurle Carle, had at any time between 1655 and 1795 been possessed as pro indiviso property, nor were any of them (with the said exception) so possessed between 1795 and the date of the present action. The possession, so far as the right of fishing was exercised at all, had always been exclusive, each possessing the fishings ex adverso of his own kavels. But it had at different periods been contended, sometimes by the one party and sometimes by the other, according to the views they took of their interests for the time being, that this separate and exclusive possession was matter of implied arrangement for occupancy merely, terminable at the pleasure of either party; and this was the view now taken up at the bar by Mr and Mrs Fleming, although they at the same time maintained (Lady Gray said inconsistently) their exclusive right to the fishings they had themselves possessed, and particularly to the fishing called the Hen fishing, the bounds of which they alleged to have been extended for some distance eastward, upon the Pow Meadow frontage, by prescriptive possession. But upon this alleged extension of boundary by prescriptive possession the Judges were unanimous that the proof was insufficient, and it is unnecessary here to go into its details.

The immediate subject of the present action was the fishing situated ex adverso of the kavel called Meadowpows, or Powlands of Inchyra. That kavel had always been treated as the exclusive property of Lady Gray and her predecessors, and her present action of declarator was brought to vindicate her exclusive right to the fishing ex adverso thereof. Mr and Mrs Fleming claimed to be pro indiviso proprietors of that fishing along with Lady Gray, in so far as they had not prescribed an exclusive right to it in connection with their Hen fishing; and, as the fishings ex adverso of all the other kavels (excepting, perhaps, the Hurle Carle fishing), stood in this respect in precisely the same position, the dispute between Lady Gray and Mr and Mrs Fleming necessarily involved the twofold inquiry—1st, whether the kavels had been held by separate or by pro indiviso title; and 2d, whether the fishings ex adverso of these kavels were held by separate or by pro indiviso titles.

Having thus explained the general nature of the case as between Lady Gray on the one hand and Mr and Mrs Fleming on the other, a few additional sentences will be sufficient to explain the position of Sir John Richardson.

By means of a submission entered into in 1744 between the Lady Gray of that day and Sir John's predecessor, Mr Hay of Pitfour, and decreet-arbitral thereon, dated 8th and 11th April 1745, an excambion had been effected, by which Mr Hay acquired from Lady Gray the kavel called the Pow Meadow or Powlands of Inchyra, assumed to have belonged to her in property, and she acquired, on the other hand, certain portions of the lands of Cairnie belonging to Mr Hay, the remainder of which, along with the lands of Pitfour, now belonged to Sir John Richardson as in place of Mr Hay. No disposition was executed of the kavel called Meadowpows, but the ground has been ever since dealt with as part and pertinent of the lands of Cairnie or Pitfour under the decreet-arbitral. The submission and decreet-arbitral did not, however, bear to give to Mr Hay any right to the fishings ex adverso of the kavel called Meadowpows, but the ground merely.

The claim made by Sir John Richardson to the Meadowpows fishing,

No. 162.

July 14, 1876.
Baroness Gray
v. Richardson
and Others.

as proprietor of the Cairnie Island and the lands of Cairnie, was altogether of a special nature, as will be seen from the note of the Lord Ordinary. It had to some extent been made the subject of a previous litigation in this Court and in the House of Lords, but it raised no question of general interest.

Sir John, however, claimed the Meadowpows fishing, in virtue (separatim) of a crown-grant obtained by him in 1873, whereby, in consideration of £100 sterling paid to the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, these Commissioners, on behalf of Her Majesty, sold, alienated, and disponed to Sir John and his heirs and successors whomsoever, "All and Whole the right and interest of Her Majesty in the salmon-fishings or salmon-fishery in the river Tay ex adverso of certain lands now belonging to him," delineated on a plan annexed and signed as relative thereto,—the lands so delineated being the Meadowpows or Powlands, which Sir John had acquired by excambion under the foresaid decreet-arbitral,—"Declaring that these presents are granted under the express stipulation that the conveyance hereby made shall in no way prejudice the right of any person or persons, other than the said disponee, who may claim right to the salmon-fishing hereby disponed, provided such person or persons shall produce a valid and effectual title thereto completed anterior to the granting of these presents, with entry at the date hereof." The warrandice in the deed was from future facts and deeds only.

Although "the lowest or eastmost fishing," being that ex adverso of the Meadowpows, had been found by the decreet-arbitral of 1795 to belong to Lord Gray in right of his wife, Sir John Richardson had been no party to the submission on which that decreet-arbitral proceeded, and it did not appear and was not averred that either Lady Gray or any other party had, until quite recently before the present process was instituted, exercised the right of fishing ex adverso of the Meadowpows, except in so far as Mr and Mrs Fleming were alleged to have encroached upon it in connection with their Hen fishing. The kavel called the Meadowpows had the largest frontage of any to the river, extending, as it did, to some 260 yards or thereby, and the fishing was considered to have now, from various causes, become of considerable value. Sir John Richardson of course founded on this want of possession of the fishing on the part of Lady Gray as making way for the operation of his crown-grant; but, on the other hand, Lady Gray and her predecessors had exercised the right of fishing contained in their titles by fishing ex adverso of their other kavels, and the Crown had never had any adverse possession.

The Lord Ordinary (Mackenzie) on 5th January 1875 pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuer is infeft in All and Whole the just and equal sunny half of All and Whole the town and lands of Inchriff, now commonly called Inchyra, and pertinents, with the just and equal half of the salmon-fishings of the said lands of Inchyra, all which lands, fishings, and others were created into one whole and free barony, called the barony of Kinfauns, conform to charter of resignation under the Great Seal in favour of Mrs Anne Blair, dated 28th February 1673: Finds that the defender, Mrs Isabella Rattray or Fleming, is infeft in All and Whole one equal half of All and Sundry the said town and lands of Inchyra and pertinents, with the just and equal half of the salmon-fishings and other fishings of the said lands of Inchyra, which lands, fishings, and others were united into one whole and free barony called the barony of Inchyra, conform to charter under the Great Seal in favour of Alexander Blair, dated 3d May 1662: Finds that the said salmon-fishings of the lands of Inchyra, in which the pursuer, and the defender Mrs Isabella Rattray or Fleming, are infeft, include the salmon-fishings in the Tay ex adverso of that portion of the estate of Pitfour and others now belonging to the defender, Sir John Stewart Richardson, and formerly called the Meadowpows or Powlands of Inchyra, as far to the east of the march-ditch running northward from the river Tay, between that part of the lands of Inchyra now belonging to the defender, Mrs Isabella Rattray or Fleming, and the estate of Pitfour, as a line drawn to the centre of the river Tay, through the three stones situated on the said portion of the estate of Pitfour and others, formerly called Meadowpows or Powlands of Inchyra, and marked, the said three stones, A B C on the copy of the Ordnance Survey Plan, No. 79 of process: Assoilzies the defender, Mrs Isabella Rattray or Fleming, and the Reverend Archibald Fleming, her husband, from the conclusions of the summons as laid, and decerns, reserving right to the pursuer to institute, with reference to the said salmon-fishings of Inchyra, such other action or actions as she may be advised, and to the defender, Mrs Fleming, and her husband, their defences thereto as accords: Finds that the defender, Sir John Stewart Richardson, has not proved that he, his predecessors and authors, proprietors of the lands of Cairnie, and of the salmon and other fishings in the water of Tay belonging to the said lands, possessed the salmon-fishings ex adverso of that portion of ground now part of the estate of Pitfour, and formerly called the Meadowpows or Powlands of Inchyra, situated between the said march-ditch and the stones A B C above mentioned, for forty years prior to the institution of the present action, or for any consecutive period of forty years, whereby their title to the salmon-fishings attached to their lands and estate of Cairnie can be made applicable to the said salmon-fishings: Finds that the dispositions obtained by the defender, Sir John Stewart Richardson, from the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues, dated 28th July and 8th August 1873, do not confer upon him any right to the salmon-fishings in the Tay ex adverso of the portion of ground above mentioned, in respect that the pursuer, and the defender Mrs Isabella Rattray or Fleming, have a valid and effectual title thereto, completed anterior to the granting of the said dispositions: Finds and declares that the defender, Sir John Stewart Richardson, has no right of salmon-fishing in the river Tay ex adverso of the said portion of ground, and that he is not entitled to fish for salmon or fish of the salmon kind in any part of the said river ex adverso of the said portion of ground, and interdicts, prohibits, and discharges the defender, Sir John Stewart Richardson, from fishing for salmon or fish of the salmon kind in any manner of way ex adverso of the said portion of ground: Finds that the defender, Sir John Stewart Richardson, has right to the salmon-fishings in the Tay situated ex adverso of his property as far west or up the Tay as the line drawn to the centre of the river through the three stones A B C above mentioned, and decerns; and appoints the cause to be put to the motion-roll, with a view to the disposal of the question of expenses."*

No. 162.

July 14, 1876.
Baroness Gray v. Richardson and Others.

---

* "NOTE.—The question raised in the present action is as to the right to the salmon-fishings in the Tay ex adverso of that piece of ground now part of the estate of Pitfour, but formerly part of Inchyra, and called the Meadowpows or Powlands of Inchyra, which is situated immediately to the east of the march-ditch running northwards from the Tay, and separating the lands of Inchyra from the estate of Pitfour. The pursuer, who is proprietor of one-half of Inchyra and of one-half of the salmon-fishings thereof, claims the sole and exclusive right to the salmon-fishings in the Tay ex adverso of that piece of ground, or at all events ex adverso of the westmost portion of said piece of ground, extending 120 yards or thereby eastward of the said march-ditch; that is, as far down the river as the three stones marked A B C on the copy plan, No. 79 of process. On that

Lady Gray reclaimed, and the case was heard at great length on different days in October and November 1875, and many additional titles

No. 162.

July 14, 1876.

Baroness Gray v. Richardson and Others.

footing she has raised the present action of declarator and interdict against Mrs Fleming, proprietrix of the other half of Inchyra, and her husband, and also against Sir John Stewart Richardson, proprietor of the adjoining estate of Pitfour. The defenders, Mrs Fleming and her husband, also claim the sole and exclusive right to these salmon-fishings, as far down as the said three stones A B C, and Sir John Richardson claims the whole of these fishings in respect of his title to the lands of Cairnie and others, part of Pitfour, and of prescriptive possession following thereon, and in respect also of two dispositions obtained by him from the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Woods, Forests, and Lands Revenues in 1873.

"The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the pursuer has failed to instruct any right to the salmon-fishings to the east of the three stones A B C.

"In regard to the salmon-fishings ex adverso of that part of the Meadowpows or Powlands between the march-ditch and the said three stones, it is necessary to notice the state of the title and the acts of the predecessors of the parties.

"Previous to the year 1744 the predecessors and authors of the pursuer, Lady Gray, and of Mrs Fleming, were each infeft under titles flowing from the Crown in one-half pro indiviso of the lands of Inchyra, and in one-half pro indiviso of the salmon-fishings of these lands. These lands were then possessed by them and their predecessors in runkavels, or by separate glebes. The eastmost kavel of Inchyra, being the Meadowpows or Powlands, was then possessed by Lady Gray, and the adjoining kavel on the west was possessed by Alexander Blair, proprietor of the other half of Inchyra. The lands of Cairnie, part of the estate of Pitfour, was situated immediately to the east of the Meadowpows or Powlands of Inchyra. Lady Gray was also proprietrix of certain lands called the Prior Lands, which formed no part of the pro indiviso lands of Inchyra, but were a separate estate. In the year 1744 Lady Gray and her husband, and Mr Hay of Pitfour, entered into a submission, which, on the narrative that there are several pieces of the lands of Cairnie lying among the Prior Lands and Powlands of Inchyra, and several pieces of the latter lands lying amongst the former, provided for the adjustment of the march between these lands by the excambion of portions of the interspersed pieces of ground. In 1745 the arbiters adjusted the march, by their decreet-arbitral, from the mill of Cairnie down to the Tay, and they gave off to Mr Hay of Pitfour the Meadowpows or Powlands then possessed by Lady Gray, and appointed march-stones with the capital letters I, on the west side of each stone, and P on the east side, to be set up in the march-baulk between the lands, that is, the kavel on the west belonging to Mr Alexander Blair of Inchyra and the Meadowpows or Powlands. The arbiters also, by their decreet-arbitral, adjudged the pieces of ground which previously belonged to Lady Gray, lying on the east and north sides of the march so fixed by them, to belong to Mr Hay, his heirs and successors, as part and pertinent of their lands of Cairnie in all time coming. No title was ever expede to the Meadowpows, and that piece of ground was thereafter held under the decreet-arbitral as a pertinent of the lands of Cairnie.

"The said submission did not include the Inchyra salmon-fishings situated ex adverso of the Meadowpows. Accordingly, the decreet-arbitral did not deal with these fishings in any way, and they remained the property of the pro indiviso proprietors of the lands of Inchyra and of the fishings thereof. The Meadowpows or Powlands had a frontage to the Tay, as is proved by the old estate plan of Pitfour, No. 81 of process, of about 260 yards.

"The salmon-fishings of Inchyra were possessed by each of the two pro indiviso proprietors opposite to the kavels respectively held by them until the year 1756, when Lady Gray and her husband Lord Gray, raised a summons of declarator in the Court of Session, concluding that they and the Misses Blair, the other proprietors pro indiviso of Inchyra, had no exclusive right to any particular fishings, and that these other proprietors should be ordained to desist from appropriating to themselves any particular fishings of the lands of Inchyra.

No. 162. July 14, 1876. Baroness Gray v. Richardson and Others.

and productions were from time to time desiderated by the Judges and obtained. Great research was made, but it was not found practicable to "This process was submitted to the Lord President and to Lord Prestongrange as arbiters, with whom various written pleadings were lodged by the parties. In the first of these pleadings, being a memorial for the Misses Blair, in 1756, the various fishings are mentioned, from the lands of Ribney on the west to the lands of Pitfour on the east. In this memorial the Misses Blair state that to the east of a kavel of Lady Gray and her fishing opposite thereto, called the Lady's Glove, there 'lyes a kavel belonging to the respondents (Misses Blair), and opposite thereto there's a fishing called the Laying Hen, and next thereto lyes a kavel the eastmost part of the lands of Inchyra, adjoining to the lands and estate of Mr Hay of Pitfour, which sometime belonged to Lady Gray, and was the largest kavel on the river of any belonging to the lands of Inchyra, and was some years ago sold off and disponed by her to the deceased Mr Hay of Pitfour in excambion for the piece of land adjoining to the lands called the Prior Lands, belonging to the Lady Gray.'

"After thus stating the situation of the lands, the Misses Blair maintained, in defence to Lady Gray's process, 'that as the claimants have some years ago disponed the largest and broadest kavel of the whole lands to Hay of Pitfour, with the water adjoining thereto, the respondents therefore humbly think that by such alienation the claimants can't now demand any share of the respondent's fishings, because they have sold off a considerable part of their own, and so are not capable, on their part, of making ane equall division; and the respondents observe this the rather because a most commodious and convenient fishing, it's thought, might have been, and is now, actually made opposite to that kavel of land which was disponed by the claimants to Hay of Pitfour.' With reference to this defence, Lady Gray stated, in a memorial lodged for her in 1757, 'that she does acknowledge that she did excamb some part of her eastmost kavel of the lands of Inchyra with Mr Hay of Pitfour, and that this excambion was settled by a submission and decreet-arbitral, an extract whereof is herewith produced to the honourable arbiters, from which it will appear that the claimant gave to Pitfour no right of fishing opposite to that part of the lands given to him, and if there can be any fishing opposite to these lands the same does still belong to the heritors of Inchyra; and it is a certain fact that Mr Hay of Pitfour has not extended his fishing opposite to the lands of Inchyra farther than he was in right or in use to do before that excambion.'

"The arbiters issued a scroll decreet-arbitral in 1757, but there is no evidence that any decreet-arbitral was ever executed. Various pleadings were thereafter lodged by the parties in 1758, in one of which the Misses Blair claimed that the fishing called Hurl Carle should be possessed in common, and in another of which Lady Gray maintained that if the Misses Blair should still insist upon this fishing being common, she and Lord Gray must 'adhere to their first claim, viz., that the whole fishings be in common, and that each party draw their equall shares of the profites thereof, in terms of their rights and infeftments.' In a subsequent pleading the Misses Blair maintained that the Hurle Carle fishing should continue to be possessed as joint property, or in commonty, by the parties, 'in the same way and manner as they have been possesst since the said fishings were made out.' This the parties seem to have done down to the year 1794, when a submission was entered into between Lady Gray and Mr Anderson of Inchyra for the division of the lands of Inchyra, but not of the fishings.

"That submission of 1794 did not embrace the salmon-fishings of the lands, but expressly reserved the same to the parties respectively, according to the then existing boundaries; but power was given to the arbiters to define the fishing by putting in march-stones. This the arbiters accordingly did. By their decreet-arbitral, dated in 1795, they found 'that the lowest or eastmost fishings belongs to Lord Gray, and is altogether opposite to the lands of Pitfour, being bounded on the west by the old march-stone between the lands of Pitfour and Inchyra, which we ordered to be marked No. 1.;' that the several fishings obtain any earlier deed or title than the crown-charter in favour of Sir Thomas Blair of July 1647, followed by the two deeds of 1655. It did between the stones No. 1 and No. 2, and the other stones therein specified and numbered, being seven in all, did all belong to Mr Anderson; that the several fishings between the stones No. 2 and No. 3, and the other stones therein specified, 'being also seven in number (besides the fishing opposite to the estate of Pitfour), do all belong to Lord Gray; and that the fishing between the stones Nos. 5 and 6, called Hurle Carle, is the joint property of Lord Gray and Mr Anderson.'

"In making the division of the lands of Inchyra contained in this decreet-arbitral of 1795 the Lord Ordinary thinks that the arbiters must have been fully aware that the Meadowpows was the eastmost kavel of the lands of Inchyra, and that they had been given in excambion by Lady Gray to Mr Hay of Pitfour, but that the salmon-fishing had not been excambed, and that they also must have taken that kavel into computation in effecting the division of the lands, because they dealt with the fishing ex adverso thereof as then forming part of the pro indiviso salmon-fishings of Inchyra. They found that the lowest or eastmost fishing belonging to Lady Gray was bounded on the west by the old march-stone between the lands of Pitfour and Inchyra, which they ordered to be marked No. 1. The boundary between the kavel belonging to Alexander Blair of Inchyra on the west, and the Meadowpows or Powlands of Inchyra given by the decreet-arbitral of 1745 to Mr Hay of Pitfour, is therein stated to be a baulk leading from the old march-ditch between the lands of Inchyra and Cairnie down to the Tay, and march-stones were thereby appointed to be set up at different places in that baulk. The old march-stone so ordered by them to be marked No. 1 must have been one of these march-stones appointed to be placed in the baulk by the decreet-arbitral of 1745. In or shortly before 1826 a ditch was cut in the line of this march-baulk, and it is proved that the march-stones which were then in the march-baulk were, after the ditch was cut, put into it, where they still remain, being five in number. On the third stone from the river there is an 'I' on the west side, and a 'P' on the east side of the stone; and on the stone nearest the river there is cut, according to the witnesses for the pursuer and for Sir John Richardson, the figure '1,' but, according to the witnesses for Mrs Fleming, the letter 'I.' There is no other mark on this stone. The pursuer's witnesses state that this stone is in its original state, while Mrs Fleming's witnesses say that a piece has split off the stone from the side opposite that on which the letter 'I' is cut. There are no marks on the other three stones in the march-ditch. The fact remains that this stone has only one figure or letter upon it. Whether the stone has split, and whether it is the figure '1' or the letter 'I' which is cut upon it, is mere matter of conjecture, and it is of no great importance, because the decreet-arbitral of 1795 proves beyond all doubt that the stone which the arbiters ordered to be marked No. 1 is the old march-stone between Inchyra and Pitfour, and that old march-stone must have been one of those placed in the above-mentioned baulk, in the line of which the present march-ditch was cut in or about 1826. Mrs Fleming maintains that the stone A on the Ordnance Survey plan, No. 79 of process, is the stone ordered to be marked No. 1 by the decreet-arbitral of 1795. But that is, it is thought, impossible, because the stone A is 86 yards to the east of the march-ditch.

"In and previous to 1826 there was situated in the Tay opposite the lands of Cairnie and the eastern part of the Meadowpows, an island called Cairnie Island, which formed part of the lands of Cairnie, and from which, or part of which, the proprietor of Pitfour was in use to fish for salmon. It is, the Lord Ordinary thinks, proved that the westmost or upper point of that island was situated opposite the old stone A, in the river bank, on the sides of which are cut the letters I and P. This stone could not be a land march, as it is situated on the Meadowpows river bank 86 or thereby yards to the east of the march-ditch between Inchyra and Pitfour, while the Meadowpows extended from that march-ditch 260 or thereby yards down the river. In 1826 Sir John Richardson connot appear how he or his family had acquired the lands and fishings of Inchyra, how it had happened that one-half of the lands stood divided in nected Cairnie Island with the Meadowpows, and filled up the channel of the river between that island and the Meadowpows. And in or about 1831 two other stones were put in the new river bank in a line between the above-mentioned old stone A and the centre of the river. These two stones marked B and C on the copy of the Ordnance Survey plan, No. 79 of process, were placed, according to the evidence of Sir John Richardson, by Mr John Anderson, W.S., brother of the then proprietor of Inchyra, and his (Sir John's) commissioner, Sir John himself and his ground-officer being present, and also the Inchyra ground-officer, an old fisher of the name of Ireland, and some others. Sir John Richardson states that he heard that the stones were prepared by Lord Gray's mason.

No. 162. July 14, 1876. Baroness Gray v. Richardson and Others.

"The above-mentioned Hen fishing was in and prior to 1838 finished at its lower or eastern extremity from a cairn. That fishing cairn was removed in 1838 by the Tay Commissioners, and a new cairn was erected nearer the land. That new cairn, called the commissioners' cairn, was used as the fishing cairn at the lower or eastern end of the Hen fishing until 1843, when it was removed, and a hauling place formed near the line of the three stones A B C on the river bank, which has been used from that date to the present time by the tacksmen of the Hen fishing.

"The Lord Ordinary thinks that he has now adverted to the chief matters which require to be attended to in disposing of the question between the parties as to the salmon-fishings between the march-ditch and the three stones A B C above-mentioned.

"1. In so far as the action is directed against Mrs Fleming and her husband, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the pursuer cannot obtain decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons. By these conclusions the pursuer asks for decree of declarator that she has the sole and exclusive right to the salmon-fishings in question, and that Mr and Mrs Fleming have no right thereto, and should be interdicted from fishing them. Mrs Fleming is infeft in the one-half pro indiviso of the Inchyra salmon-fishings, and the pursuer is infeft in the other half thereof. The pursuer, therefore, cannot obtain against Mrs Fleming and her husband the absolute and exclusive decree which she claims.

"The Lord Ordinary is satisfied that the Hen fishing terminated at the march-ditch separating the lands of Inchyra from Pitfour,—that is, from the Meadowpows or Powlands,—and that this fishing was situated ex adverso of the kavel on the west, which belonged in 1745 to Alexander Blair of Inchrya. That is clear from the decreet-arbitral of 1745, and from the memorial of 1756 for the Misses Blair of Inchyra, the predecessors of Mrs Fleming, and also from the decreet-arbitral of 1795. Even assuming that there had been no change since 1795 in the possession of the fishings by the pro indiviso proprietors, either by consent of these parties or rebus et factis, that old allocation or possession of the fishings would not, the Lord Ordinary thinks, warrant the absolute declarator of property in the fishings opposite the Meadowpows concluded for by the pursuer; although it might have warranted a decree of a limited and possessory nature, such a decree cannot, it is thought, be pronounced under the conclusions of the present summons. But even although that were competent, the pursuer could not obtain it, because it is proved that in 1844 a new allocation of the Inchyra fishing was made by the two pro indiviso proprietors. At that date Mrs Fleming's predecessor was in possession of the fishing to the east of the Hen fishing and of the march-ditch, and was fishing that fishing as far down as the stones A B C as part of the Hen. That extended piece of fishing only became available in 1843 by the removal of stones from the bed of the river which interfered with the hauling of the net; and from the time that it became available down to the date of the present action it has been fished as part of the Hen under that new division or allocation of the fishing made in 1844.

"The defenders, Mr and Mrs Fleming, maintained that they have proved prescriptive possession of the fishing between the Glove fishing and the stones A his person into quarters, nor when or how the lands came first to be mapped out into kavels. No. 162.

July 14, 1876.
Baroness Gray v. Richardson and Others.

B C. A great amount of evidence has been led on this point. After carefully considering that evidence, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the account given with reference to this fishing by the pursuer's witnesses, George Gelletly, John Lennox, Andrew Swan, tacksman of the Hen from 1835 to 1843, and by Sir John Richardson's witnesses, Archibald Powrie, tacksman of the Hen fishing in 1843, and from that date to 1847, and James Davidson, also a tacksman of the Hen fishing, is entitled to much greater weight than the account given by the witnesses for Mr and Mrs Fleming. From the evidence of these witnesses the Lord Ordinary is satisfied that until 1838 the Hen fishing terminated at a fishing cairn situated nearly opposite the march-ditch which is the old eastern boundary of that fishing according to the memorial for the Misses Blair in 1756 above-mentioned; that this cairn was removed by the Tay Commissioners in 1838, and a new fishing cairn erected nearer high-water mark, and a short distance farther down the river than the march-ditch, and that this new cairn, called the Commissioners' cairn, was removed in 1843, at the expense of the Tay Commissioners, by Archibald Powrie, who ploughed and levelled the beach with levelling boxes, in which operation he took away thousands of tons of gravel; that he thus formed a new hauling place for the salmon nets on the river bank, a little above the line of the stones A B C; and that this new hauling place was used as the place for hauling the nets of the fishers fishing the Hen from 1843 down to the date of the present action. Mr and Mrs Fleming maintained that they have been in possession of the Hen fishing for forty years and upwards prior to the date of the action, and had acquired a prescriptive right thereto, and were entitled to have it found that they had the sole and exclusive right to that fishing. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that they have not proved possession for forty years and upwards, and that it is proved that the Hen was not fished by them and their predecessors below the march ditch until 1838, and that the fishing was only extended down to the present hauling place in 1843. There is great discrepancy in the evidence on this point. But the Lord Ordinary considers that the evidence for the pursuer and for Sir John Richardson is entitled to much greater reliance than the evidence for Mr and Mrs Fleming. Farther, Mr and Mrs Fleming can never acquire, as in a question with the pursuer, an exclusive right to any part of the Inchyra fishings in the face of their own title, which gives them only a right to one-half of these fishings, while the pursuer is infeft in the other half thereof.

"Upon this question of prescription Mr and Mrs Fleming maintained that there was a strip of uncultivated ground or 'green' extending from the march-ditch down to the old stone A, and situated between the old river bank and the river, which belonged to and was pastured by their predecessors. But that ground or 'green' was part of the Meadowpows which was adjudged to Pitfour by the decreet-arbitral of 1745, his western boundary being therein defined as the baulk which 'leads down to the water Tay.' It appears from the evidence that the Inchyra cows pastured this piece of ground for a few years prior to 1826, when it was of little value, but in doing so they trespassed upon Sir John Richardson's property, and all such trespass ceased in 1826, when the new embankment was formed and the march-ditch deepened.

"2. As regards the defender, Sir John Richardson, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that he has completely failed to prove prescriptive possession of the salmon-fishings, on his title to the lands of Cairnie, above the western extremity of Cairnie Island, which, as is proved, extended up the river only as far as the line of the stones A B C. His title to the lands of Cairnie gave him only a right to the salmon-fishings of these lands, and the western boundary of these fishings was the western end of Cairnie Island. The decreet-arbitral of 1745 gave him no right to the salmon-fishings of the Meadowpows. These fishings then belonged, and still belong, to the proprietors of the estate of Inchyra. The old march-stone A, which has I and P cut upon it, was not a land march-stone. It has been in its present place beyond the memory of man. It is proved by the witness James Davidson to have been there sixty-one years ago. The faggot dyke, which was erected in 1807 with a view to the filling up of the channel between Cairnie Island and the north river bank of the Meadowpows, ran between this stone and the western extremity of Cairnie Island. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that this old stone must have been a fishing march-stone, put in to indicate the eastern end of the Inchyra fishing, probably in or about 1795, when the other march-stones were placed in the march-baulk. The view that this old stone was a fishing march-stone is supported by the fact that more than two-thirds of the Meadowpows are situated to the east of it, and by the placing in 1831 of the stones B and C in the new embankment connecting and incorporating Cairnie Island with the north river bank. There is also a great deal of evidence in the proof to the effect that when these two stones B and C were put in the new river bank they were inserted in connection with the old stone A, for the purpose of defining the march between the Inchyra and Cairnie fishings, a very necessary act, seeing that Cairnie Island had been recently incorporated with the river bank, and its western end obliterated. It is also proved that the old stone A went by the name of the old Hen march-stone, and was so called by aged witnesses long since dead. Sir John Richardson, his ground-officer, the gardener of Mr Anderson of Inchyra, who was the predecessor of Mrs Fleming, an old fisher called Ireland, and some others, were present when the two new stones B and C were fixed. Robert Young, who fished the Glove fishing in 1834 and 1835, depones that the two stones were called the march-stones of the Hen betwixt Sir John and Inchyra, and that Ireland (who sometimes fished with him) told him that he 'howkit' the holes and put the two new stones into them, and that they were put in 'for the march betwixt Sir John and Inchyra.'

No. 162. At the advising, on 11th January 1876, the following opinions were delivered:—

July 14, 1876.
Baroness Gray v. Richardson and Others.

"Sir John Richardson maintained, on the authority of the opinions expressed in the case of Lord Wemyss v. The Town of Perth, 31st May 1867, 39 Scottish Jurist, p. 429, with reference to Balhepburn Island, that his Cairnie fishings were not limited by the western extremity of Cairnie Island, and that as proprietor of that island he was entitled to fish as far up the river from its western extremity as his nets could reach. But that case is not, the Lord Ordinary thinks, in point. Sir John has a title to the lands of Cairnie, and to the salmon-fishing belonging to these lands. In the Balhepburn case the title gave the town of Perth the sole and exclusive right to the salmon-fishings in the Tay pertaining to Balhepburn Island, lying either round about the 'said island, and upon every part of the same, or wherever the same lyes, or may or shall lye, any manner of way,' and the town was in possession of that right. Sir John Richardson has not proved that he ever possessed any right to fish as he now claims from the western end of Cairnie Island. From 1843 Mr and Mrs Fleming and their predecessors have been in possession of the salmon-fishings opposite the Meadowpows as far down as the stones A B C, that is, as far down the river as the western extremity of Cairnie Island where Sir John's Dadhead fishing begins, and when his Dadhead fishers attempted to come upon the water above these three stones, on two or three occasions since 1843, the tow-rope of their nets was cut and they were turned off. That possession, and these acts of Mrs Fleming and her predecessors are, the Lord Ordinary thinks, available to the pursuer, seeing that they are pro indiviso proprietors, and that such possession was obtained and held under an arrangement between them for the allocation of the fishings.

"It was also maintained by Sir John Richardson that the pursuer had failed to instruct that the Meadowpows were a part of the lands of Inchyra to which a grant of salmon-fishings is attached, and that the Meadowpows are not a part of the Prior Lands belonging exclusively to the pursuer, the titles to which do not confer a right of salmon-fishing. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the Meadowpows were a part of the lands of Inchyra, and not a part of the Prior Lands. The Meadowpows are situated at the eastern end of Inchyra, and are a continuation of these lands along the Tay, whereas the Prior Lands are at a distance from the Tay, and are separated from the Meadowpows by other parts of LORD DEAS.—The summons in this case concludes that it should be found and declared that the pursuer, Lady Gray, "has the sole and exclusive right to the salmon-fishings in the river Tay ex adverso of that piece of ground formerly called the Meadowpows or Powlands of Inchyra, and which formerly belonged to the pursuer's predecessors, and which now belongs to the defender, Sir John

---

Inchyra and by the lands of Cairnie. This is proved by the old Inchyra estate plan of 1769, No. 80 of process, and by the table of contents therein, and also by the old estate plan of Pitfour, No. 81 of process. Sir John Richardson, when examined as a witness, also proves this, and so do other witnesses. There is also another old estate plan of the lands of Inchyra, No. 141 of process, which shews that the Prior Lands are situated at a considerable distance from the Meadowpows. It is no doubt the case that the submission of 1744 was between Lady Gray and Mr Hay of Pitfour, and that Mr Blair, the other pro indiviso proprietor of Inchyra, was not a party to it, but that arose, the Lord Ordinary thinks, from the mistaken notion that each pro indiviso proprietor was entitled to deal with any kavel possessed by him as if it were his absolute property. Accordingly, the decreet-arbitral of 1745, in defining the western march of the Meadowpows, described it as a 'march-baulk betwixt the lands belonging to Alexander Blair of Inchyra on the west, and that piece of ground commonly called the Meadowpows or Powlands' which belonged to Lady Gray, and was given off by that decreet to Pitfour. Now, the land belonging to Alexander Blair on the west was simply the kavel of the pro indiviso lands of Inchyra situated immediately to the west of the Meadowpows, which was the eastern kavel thereof, possessed by Lady Gray.

"The pleadings of the proprietors of Inchyra in the submission of 1756 also clearly prove this. The memorial of 1756 for the Misses Blair states that the kavel adjoining the Meadowpows on the west belongs to them, 'and next thereto lyes a kavel, the eastmost part of the lands of Inchyra adjoining to the lands and estate of Hay of Pitfour, which sometime belonged to Lady Gray,' and was some years ago given by her in excambion to Hay of Pitfour. The memorial for Lady Gray in 1757, in answer to that for the Misses Blair, acknowledges 'that she did excamb some part of her eastmost kavel of the lands of Inchyra with Mr Hay of Pitfour,' as settled by the decreet-arbitral, but that she gave to Pitfour no right of fishing opposite to that part of the lands given to him, and that the fishing belongs to the heritors of Inchyra. In the decreet-arbitral of 1795 the lowest or eastmost fishing of Inchyra, situated to the east of the Inchyra and Pitfour march, is dealt with as belonging to Lord Gray.

"Sir John Richardson maintains that these memorials and the decreet-arbitral of 1795 are not competent evidence against him on the question whether the Meadowpows are a part of Inchyra or of the Prior Lands. The Lord Ordinary is of a different opinion. These memorials contain statements of fact of very old date, made by parties with reference to fishings belonging to them. Sir John Richardson's predecessors acquired in 1745 a piece of land then also their property, but he did not acquire any right to the salmon-fishing ex adverso thereof, and never had any right thereto. The submission of 1794 and decreet-arbitral of 1795 had reference, besides the division of the remainder of the lands of Inchyra, to the possession of these salmon-fishings and the insertion of march-stones for the purpose of defining the boundaries of the salmon-fishings belonging to the proprietors respectively. The stone A, which has the letter I cut on the east side and the letter P cut on the west side thereof, is not without significance in connection with the decreet-arbitral of 1795, placed as it is in the land then acquired by Sir John opposite the upper end of Cairnie Island, and at a distance of eighty-six yards from the march-ditch, and of 174 yards from the eastern end of the Meadowpows. But even if it were held that these pleadings and the decreet-arbitral of 1795 cannot be founded on as evidence against Sir John Richardson on this question as to the identity of the lands, it is sufficiently established by the parole proof that the Meadowpows are not a part of the Prior Lands, but are a part of the lands of Inchyra."

No. 162.
July 14, 1876.
Baroness Gray v. Richardson and Others.

Stewart Richardson," or otherwise to the salmon-fishings ex adverso of the westmost portion of that piece of ground to the extent of 120 yards. The summons contains a farther conclusion that it should be found and declared that neither Sir John nor Mr and Mrs Fleming, who are the only other parties called as defenders, have any right of salmon-fishing ex adverso of the said piece of ground, or at all events ex adverso of said westmost portion thereof, and that they should be interdicted from interfering with the pursuer's possession and enjoyment thereof accordingly.

It will contribute to clearness to consider, in the first instance, the question as between Lady Gray on the one hand, and Mr and Mrs Fleming on the other. The dispute with Sir John Stewart Richardson is of quite a different nature, and I shall deal with it afterwards.

The Lord Ordinary has assoilzied the defenders, Mr and Mrs Fleming, "from the conclusions of the action as laid, reserving right to the pursuer to institute, with reference to the said salmon-fishings of Inchyra, such other action or actions as she may be advised."

The single ground assigned by the Lord Ordinary for this decision is that one-half pro indiviso of the whole fishings of Inchyra, including the fishing in dispute, belongs to Mr and Mrs Fleming, and the other half pro indiviso to Lady Gray. If this be so I cannot doubt that his Lordship's decision falls to be affirmed. But after very full and careful investigation into the titles I am humbly of opinion that such is not the state of the titles here, either as regards the fishing ex adverso of that part of the estate of Inchyra called the Meadowpows, which is directly in controversy, or as regards the other fourteen or fifteen valuable fishings belonging to the two parties respectively along the river boundary, the property of which, it is quite clear, must be governed by the same rule which is applicable to the Meadowpow fishing.

The Lord Ordinary holds that, anterior to the submissions and decrees-arbitral to be immediately noticed, there was no distinction between the right and title of the parties to the lands of Inchyra and their right and title to the fishings, that is to say, that both lands and fishings equally belonged to them pro indiviso. He says in his note,—"Previous to the year 1744 the predecessors and authors of the pursuer, Lady Gray, and of Mrs Fleming, were each infeft, under titles flowing from the Crown, in one-half pro indiviso of the lands of Inchyra, and in one-half pro indiviso of the salmon-fishings of these lands." Following out this view to its legitimate conclusion the Lord Ordinary accounts for the fact that Lady Gray did not obtain the consent of Mr and Mrs Fleming's predecessor to the transference of the Meadowpows to Sir John Richardson's predecessor under the submission of 1744, by observing that this "arose," the Lord Ordinary thinks, "from the mistaken notion that each pro indiviso proprietor was entitled to deal with any kavel possessed by him as if it were his absolute property."

If the Lord Ordinary were right in supposing that the title of the parties to the Inchyra estate, consisting as it did of a great number of interjected portions called kavels, of which the Meadowpows was one, was a pro indiviso title, it would follow, of course, that the predecessor of Lady Gray could not possibly transfer the property of the Meadowpows to the predecessor of Sir John Richardson without the concurrence of the predecessor of Mr and Mrs Fleming. That the Lord Ordinary should have proceeded on the assumption that the title was a pro indiviso title is not perhaps surprising when it is considered that the parties themselves had, at different periods of their former litigations, maintained varying and inconsistent views on this subject, influenced, no doubt, by their supposed interests for the time being, and that it has only been after the case came into the Inner-House that an approximation has been made to a full recovery and placing before the Court of important titles and documents, which were not before the Lord Ordinary in this case, nor before the Court and the House of Lords in the action instituted by Sir John Richardson against Mr and Mrs Fleming, decided in this Court on 16th July 1868, and in the House of Lords on 28th July 1871, 43 Scot. Jur. 448.

From the titles latterly produced we find that in and prior to 1655 Sir Alexander Blair of Balthayock stood vested, under the Crown, as proprietor of the whole lands of Inchyra, with the salmon and other fishings pertaining thereto. By charter and disposition dated 16th June of that year Sir Alexander, in consideration of a price paid, sold and disponed to William Blair of Tarsappie, the predecessor of Lady Gray, "all and haill the just and equal sunie half of all and haill the town and lands of Inchyra, with houses, biggings," pendicles, and pertinents, &c., "as the same is presentlie occupyed and possessed by Andro Lyell and Allan Peat, with the just and equal halff of the miln of the said lands of Inchyra, miln lands, multures, and sequels thereof, together with the just and equal halff of the salmond-fishinges and uthers fishinges of the saidis landes of Inchyra, and all and haill the passage upone the water of Tay called the ferry, with the ferry boates, privileges, and commodities thereof."

Having thus disposed of the one-half of the estate of Inchyra, Sir Alexander Blair shortly thereafter sold and disponed the other half to his brother Andrew Blair and his wife, for a price paid, apparently out of the wife's funds. The disposition is dated 2d August 1655, and conveys to the purchasers and the heirs-male of their marriage, &c., "all and haill that quarter or fourt part of the towne and landis of Inchyra, with houses, biggings," &c., "and pertinents thereof, last occupyet be James Blair, and now by myself," and sicklike, "all and haill the other quarter or fourt pairt of all and haill the saidis towne and landis of Inchyra, with houses, biggings, pendicles, and pertinents thereof, presentlie possest be Gilbert Lyell, my tennent, with the just and equal half of the mylne of Inchyra, mylne lands, multures, and sequels of the samen, used and wont, with the just and equal half of the salmond-fishings and other fishings of the saidis landis of Inchyra, and all and haill that malt barn, kill, and coubill, presentlie possessit by the said Gilbert Lyel, and all and haill these houses and yards of Inchyra, presentlie possessit by Francis Jack."

These two deeds were respectively followed by infeftment, and the same description of the subjects has been substantially continued in the feudal titles of the respective parties down to the present time. The first mentioned deed forms the commencement of Lady Gray's separate progress, and the second mentioned deed the commencement of that of the Flemings.

Reading these two deeds together we find that the one-half, which now belongs to Lady Gray, is described as the sunny half (synonymous, it is understood, with the eastern half), and is said to be then occupied and possessed by Andrew Lyell and Allan Peat; and the other half, which now belongs to Mr and Mrs Fleming, is stated to consist of two quarters, the one of which had been last occupied by James Blair, and was then occupied by Sir Alexander himself, while the other quarter is stated to be then possessed by Gilbert Lyell, Sir Alexander's tenant, and the houses and yards belonging thereto to be then

No. 162.
July 14, 1876.
Baroness Gray v. Richardson and Others.

possessed by Francis Jack. It seems impossible therefore, prima facie at least, to resist the conclusion that what Sir Alexander Blair conveyed to each of his original disponees and their successors was not a pro indiviso but a separate half of the town and lands of Inchyra, each disponee becoming the exclusive proprietor of the half conveyed to him.

But this point is somewhat complicated by the fact that within less than a century after the date of the two conveyances thus granted by Sir Alexander Blair we find evidence under the hands of the predecessors of both of the parties whose rights I am now considering (and indeed the fact is not disputed), that long before that time (how long does not appear) the whole estate of Inchyra (extending to between 400 and 500 Scots acres) had been parcelled out into lots or kavels, upwards, I think, of one hundred in number, of various sizes, but the two next each other being generally nearly of a size, and that Lady Gray's predecessors, and the predecessors of the Flemings, had been respectively and immemorially in the enjoyment of each alternate kavel, in regular succession, and that this continued down to the date of the decreet-arbitral of 1795, to be immediately adverted to. The counsel on both sides have referred to the plan, No. 141 of process, as sufficiently accurate for reference on this subject, with the explanation that the Meadowpows, which formed the eastmost kavel, is not shewn on that plan, having been previously transferred to Sir John Richardson.

The way in which this ancient parcelling out of the lands has complicated the question of title has been by giving rise to an idea, which seems to have impressed the mind of the Lord Ordinary, that the parcelling out had been intended for occupancy only, and not as marking out the separate property of the parties. To remove this idea as regards the lands is vital to the question of title to the fishings, to which, by natural transition, the Lord Ordinary applies the same rule when he says "that old allocation or possession of the fishings would not, the Lord Ordinary thinks, warrant the absolute declarator of property in the fishings opposite the Meadowpows, although it might have warranted a decree of a limited and possessory nature," which is not concluded for.

I have therefore been anxious to obtain what light I could upon the nature and effect of dividing an estate by kavels, or, in other words, of parcelling it out between two or more proprietors in the form of runrig or rundale. The practice has been long abandoned, and the means of information in regard to it, although they may be considered sufficient, are certainly not more than sufficient for the present purpose. It was frequently resorted to in early times when an estate had to be divided among heirs-portioners or adjudgers, so that each got a share of the different kinds of soil and climate which the locality afforded, although at other times one continuous portion was allotted to each, as is invariably done in modern times since planting and improvement introduced a preference for a compact estate. The most common mode of proceeding, whether by heirs-portioners or adjudgers, was by obtaining a brieve of division from Chancery, directed to the Sheriff or other Judge Ordinary, who summoned a jury, at whose sight kavels, as they were called, were cast for the different lots, which, after an equalising valuation, were apportioned accordingly.

Lord Stair, who published his work in 1693, gives a form of the brieve, which is retained in our familiar style books at the present day. There is no difference either in the form of the brieve or in the effect of the procedure, whether the division is to be by alternate kavels or in any other way. The object and effect was, and is, to divide not merely the possession, but the right of property, and so the matter is treated of by all the authorities. Balfour, in his Practicks (p. 440-1), gives a full account of the procedure under the brieve of division, the object of which, he says, is "to ken ilk ane of thame to thair awin parties" of the lands. "And efter the inquest has partit and dividit the saidis landis, the Clerk of the Court sould put the samin in form of ane rolment and decrete of the said inquest, and cause the samin to be seillet with the seilles of the persounis of inquest, togidder with the Schiref's seill; and thairefter the said Schiref sould cause the saidis persounis to cast cavellis upon the saidis partis," after which the parties are to be entered "ilk ane to thair awin part, conform to the cavil obtenit be thame, and to be bruikit and joisit be thame in all time cuming, conform to the decrete and deliverance of the said inquest, and the meithis and marchis expremit thairin." He afterwards says, in substance, that although the division may be reduced, if not fairly and equally done, yet "gif ather of the parties gevis infeftment to his sone, or any uther persoun, of any part of the landis fallin to him be the said divisioun, he ratifies and apprevis the samin, and thairfoir on na wayis may impugn the said divisioun, nor call for reduction thairof."

No. 162.
July 14, 1876.
Baroness Gray v. Richardson and Others.

Bankton says (i. 8, 38),—"The division among co-heirs, co-adjudgers, or other conjunct proprietors, pro indiviso, proceeds on a brieve out of Chancery, directed to the Sheriff of the bounds, subject to the review of the Lords of Session, though the sentence is founded on a verdict. In the division among heirs-portioners, the mansion-house, yards, and garden or orchards, not in use to be set for rent, will be allotted to the eldest; and she is likewise preferred to the custody of the writings." This is obviously treating the division as a division of property, and not of occupancy merely. I may observe, however, that what the learned author says about review by the Court of Session must be taken as qualified by the judgment in Cathcart v. Rocheid, Feb. 22, 1772, M. 7663.

Mr Bell, in his Commentaries (vol. i. p. 64, 5th ed.), in like manner treats the brieve of division as applicable to the property of the subjects; and in a note he observes—"For the case of heirs-portioners the very old form of a brieve of division still subsists. It is directed to the Sheriff—a jury is named under his authority to measure and lay off the shares, and by lot they are appropriated to those interested. The matter is commonly arranged extrajudicially by referees." In his Principles (sec. 1081, 3d ed.) he details the procedure, and says—"5. The verdict settles the shares, and lots being cast, the division is fixed by decree of the Court. 6. Extract and possession complete the separate rights of the parties in their shares of what was formerly common." Mr Bell describes the remedy by brieve as competent to all joint proprietors, and in sec. 1083 he mentions that among heirs-portioners "peerage or superiority go as præcipuum to the eldest," and that this preference is extended to a mansion-house.

But it is from Dallas, our oldest and most authoritative formalist, that we get the most direct and valuable information, because he gives us the style of a decreet of division in which the mode adopted is division into two halves by runrig, which is just the mode in which we find the lands of Inchyra to have been here divided.

It would appear to have been the practice to issue a decreet to the party to whom fell the sunny half of the lands, and a separate decreet to the party to whom fell the shady half. Accordingly, the style given by Dallas is the style of the decreet issued to the party to whom had fallen the shadowy half.

No. 162.
July 14, 1876.
Baroness Gray v. Richardson and Others.

After narrating the brieve, the swearing of the inquest, and other preliminary proceedings, the style bears, "which persons of inquest, after long consultation and advisement, divided the forenamed lands into halves betwixt the said portioners by runrig, as it shall happen them by cavel, conform to the points of the brieve as they lie in length and breadth, after which declaration and deliverance in plain Court the Judge caused cast cavels, and to the said J. fell the shadow half; to the which verdict the said Judge instantly interposed his authority, and kenned and entered the said J. B., compearing for the said J. in her name, and himself for his interest, which division of the forenamed lands, made in manner foresaid, the said Judge decerned and ordained to be observed and kept by both the said parties, and the said lands to be bruiked and joysed by them, their heirs and successors, conform to the said division. In witness of the which I have caused my Clerk of Court subscribe these present letters testimonials with his hand at S., the day of years."

A note is added—"This brieve is not retoured, for the Judge puts all immediately in execution, and the parties in possession conform."

It will be specially noted that in the style thus given by Dallas the inquest are said to have "divided the forenamed lands into two halves betwixt the said portioners by runrig," and at the same time the half which fell to one of the parties (consisting obviously of kavels alternating with those which fell to the other party), is called the shadowy half. We have thus the authority of that eminent conveyancer for holding that where the just and equal half of certain lands was conveyed to one party, and the other just and equal half to another party, such conveyances were quite apt and habile as titles to cover the case of each half, consisting of alternate kavels, lying runrig or rundale, although that could only be seen on going to the ground. And this, again (I may as well here observe by anticipation), suggests that similar conveyances of the just and equal halves of the fishings of the same lands would be equally apt and habile, in the language of those days, to convey to each of the parties the alternate fishings ex adverso of their respective kavels, although this peculiar position and alternation of the fishings, in like manner with the peculiar position and alternation of the lands, could only become known by going to the locality and ascertaining how these fishings were marked out and possessed. It follows that infeftment in "all and haill the just and equal sunie half of all and haill the toune and lands of Inchyra, together with the just and equal half of the salmon-fishings of the said lands of Inchyra," was then, and consequently still is, in point of expression, an apt and habile feudal title to the exclusive property of all and each of the kavels which constituted that half, and to the exclusive property of all and each of the fishings connected with that half, if such appears to have been really the meaning intended to be expressed—of which afterwards.

The parties, I understand, have made every effort in order to discover at what period the lands of Inchyra were parcelled out into kavels, but without success. All the probabilities are against this having taken place subsequent to the deeds of alienation of 1655, and as no writings connected with it have been found within that period, I conclude that it must have occurred anterior to the date of these deeds, either by voluntary deed of agreement, now lost, or under a brieve or action at the instance of adjudging creditors or heirs-portioners. The fact that the whole estate in the person of Sir Alexander Blair was made up of a half and two separate fourths points strongly to the conclusion that there had been a judicial division by kavels in or before his time, and that the estate stood in that form when he transferred it to his respective disponees in 1655. We have no titles shewing how he acquired either the sunny half or the two-fourths, constituting the other half; but the presumption, post tantum temporis, is that the division by kavels was made in a manner lawful and usual at the time, and if so, the result would be the same whatever the precise form of procedure may have been.

No. 162.

July 14, 1876.
Baroness Gray v. Richardson and Others.

It is not very easy now to see the consistency of calling one half of a divided estate the sunny half and the other the shady half, where both halves were intermingled with each other in alternate kavels, as the halves of the estate of Inchyra undoubtedly were. Mr Johnstone suggested an explanation, which I think probably correct, viz., that the party to whom fell the sunny or eastern half was entitled to the kavel nearest the morning sun; the party to whom fell the shady half to the next kavel, and so on alternately, so that a kavel of the first party was always to the east of a kavel of the second party, so long as the whole were not exhausted. Beginning with the Meadowpows, and leaving out of view what were then the commonty lands farther inland, this would pretty well accord, in a rough and round way, with what we find to have been the distribution of the kavels of Inchyra. Be this as it may, however, it is certain, as we see from Dallas, that in those days it was quite well known which half was the sunny and which the shady half, although the whole consisted of kavels lying runrig or rundale, and that is enough for the present purpose.

After the passing of the Act 1695, c. 23, "anent lands lying runrig," questions arose whether the Act was meant to be applicable to the lands of two proprietors which lay intermixed, in alternate fields (more accurately called rundale), or had in view only lands which lay in alternate ridges (crooked for the convenience of ploughing), such as were within my own memory, and perhaps may be still to be seen within burghal territory to which the Act does not apply. At first the Court were inclined to put what was called a liberal construction on the Act, and held it to extend to fields of considerable size. But when it afterwards came to be clearly perceived that what the Act authorised was really not division of common property but excambion of separate property, the Judges generally came to think that it could not have been intended to compel an excambion except where the lands to be excambed were of comparatively limited extent; and, after varying decisions, it was latterly decided in a suit at the instance of Lady Gray against Mrs Blair and others, applicable to the very lands or kavels we are now dealing with, that action on the statute could not be sustained as to fields containing more than four acres (17th January 1782, M. 14,151). Looking to the number of fields shewn on the plans produced of smaller extent than four acres, that judgment would apparently have warranted a decerniture as concluded for with reference to these smaller fields, but an appeal entered against the judgment was withdrawn, and no farther procedure in the action is understood to have taken place. If that decision was a sound one Bankton (i. 8, 9) had put too limited a construction on the Act when he confined it to cases "where one heritor has one ridge or rig and another the second, and so on, interchangeably, over the whole parcel of land; and this takes place between two or more proprietors; and, from the nature of the thing, can only be of arable lands." Erskine had anticipated more accurately what the Court ultimately found when he said (iii. 3, 59),—"The division competent to landholders by the last quoted Act, 1695, is not in practice confined to runrig lands in a strict sense of the word, but is, by liberal interpretation, extended to cases where the properties of the several heritors are broken off, not by single ridges, but perhaps by roods or acres."

No. 162.

July 14, 1876.
Baroness Gray v. Richardson and Others.

The whole estate of Inchyra, both infield and outfield, stood in 1782 parcelled out into kavels, some of them large and some of them small, and thus afforded an example at once of rundale and of runrig strictly so called. The word "runrig" appears to have been the generic word, but the nature of the power conferred by the Act 1695, which enabled one of two neighbours to compel an excambion of property without the other's consent, coupled with the declared policy of that Act in connection with previous statutes, led ultimately to a somewhat strict construction being put on the word "runrig" as used in the Act. But the general principles applicable to runrig and rundale had always been the same; and when the Lady Gray and the Blairs of 1782 joined issue upon whether the Act 1695 was applicable to their Inchyra kavels or not, they necessarily did so upon the footing that the kavels of each were the separate and exclusive property of each. The report of the case accordingly narrates that "their respective properties lay blended together in a great number of fields of different sizes. Some of these fields consisted of 35 acres, some of them of 10, but by far the greatest part did not exceed 5 acres." The judgment obviously proceeded upon the footing that the kavels were the separate and exclusive property of the parties respectively, and the Court accordingly applied to the case the principle affirmed in the previous case of Buchanan v. Clark (M. 14,143, bottom), "that the Act 1695, which in the cases to which it applies obliges a man to part with his property without his consent, being in some measure an encroachment on it, ought not to be extended."

Long before the date of the judgment of 1782, viz., in 1745, the same Lady Gray, who afterwards became pursuer in that action, had asserted and exercised her separate and exclusive right of property in the kavel called Meadowpows, in the strongest of all ways, viz., by transferring it for other land, equivalent in value, to the proprietor of Pitfour, through the medium of a submission and decree-arbitral, which were both publicly recorded in July of the same year. The land so transferred has been openly possessed and enjoyed ever since as part and portion of the Pitfour estate, and neither Mr and Mrs Fleming, nor any of their predecessors, have ever either objected to or judicially challenged that transaction. No difference has been or can be suggested between the nature of what was Lady Gray's right of property in that kavel, and her right of property in the other Inchyra kavels, alternating with those of the Flemings.

An objection to this transaction, on the ground that it was ultra vires of Lady Gray, would indeed have been altogether inconsistent with the relative position which the parties had all along assumed towards each other, as proprietors of their respective kavels, and which they were, at that very time, acting upon under a submission entered into in September 1743, and which issued in a decreet-arbitral in October 1747, recorded, along with the submission, in October 1748.

There was an uncultivated muir called the Muir of Inchyra, and there were certain greens along the margin of the Tay (which is there a public navigable river) of the nature of sea greens, that is, greens over which the tide occasionally flows, and which, as Mr Erskine explains (ii. 6, 17), have been sometimes thought to be inter regalia, but which he himself, agreeing with Bankton (vol. i. p. 83, sec. 4), considered to be ruled by the case of Bruce, Nov. 25, 1714, M. 9342, in which it was found "that the sea greens might belong to the neighbouring heritors, as part and pertinent, without special right," and decree was

No. 162.
July 14, 1876.
Baroness Gray v. Richardson and Others.

pronounced assoilzieing from a declarator to the contrary, "in so far as the defenders' exclusive possession of property by pasturage, or casting feal and divot, was proved."

The submission of 1743 bore to be between Lady Gray, heritable proprietor of the half lands of Inchyra, with consent of her husband on the one part, and Alexander Blair, with consent of his daughters, the heirs-apparent of their deceased brother Dr John Blair, who, it is stated, "was heritable proprietor of the other half lands of Inchyra," on the other part.

It is clear enough (particularly from what followed) that this meant that each was heritable proprietor of the respective kavels which were then and had immemorially been possessed by each. There was not a suggestion of pro indiviso property in any of these kavels. On the contrary, the Muir of Inchyra and other rights held in common, and which were singled out as the objects of dispute in the submission, were carefully distinguished throughout from the property lands, which could only have been the kavels. The subject-matter of the submission was stated to be the "several rights, claims, and pretensions" of the parties "to the muir commonly called the Muir of Inchyra, and to the whole other commonties of the saids whole lands of Inchyra, and likewise anent any illegal or unwarrantable encroachment, made or pretended to be made, by either of the parties submitters upon the property or commonty of the saids lands, or any part thereof, with full power to the arbiters before named to divide the said common muir and other commonties belonging to the said lands, and to allocate and assign such parts or portions thereof to either party as they shall think fit, and to decide and determine what either of the saids parties submitters shall do, pay, or perform to one another, for any cause or occasion preceding the date hereof."

The decreet-arbitral which followed bears—"We find that each of the saids parties submitters have an equal right of commonty in the said Muir of Inchyra, and on that other piece of ground besouth the miln, and on the heall greens, from east to west, lying betwixt the laboured lands of Inchyra and the river of Tay." Following up this finding the arbiters allocated a specific portion on the north side of the Muir of Inchyra, then marked out by march-stones, to belong to Lady Gray "in full property," and a specific portion, likewise marked by march-stones, on the south side of the muir, "to be the sole and full property" of the Blairs.

In like manner the arbiters appointed "the eastmost part of the high grounds of the miln inch, lying besouth the miln of Inchyra, and adjacent to the said Alexander Blair his part of the miln inch, long since divided, as ascertained by march-stones now fixt, to be the property of the said Alexander Blair and his said daughters and their heirs, and the westmost part of the said high grounds of the foresaid miln inch, as already meithed out and divided from the other part by march-stones sett, to be the property" of the Blairs. A similar appointment was made as to the east and west parts of the low ground of the miln inch, "long since divided," excepting in both cases what was marched off for repairing the dam-dyke, the use of the miller, and access along the miln lead, "and declare the same to continue in common."

Lastly, the arbiters appointed "the greens that ly from east to west betwixt the laboured lands of Inchyra and the river of Tay, and possesst in common by both heritors of Inchyra, to belong in property to each of the said heritors and their heirs as aforesaid, opposite to their laboured grounds respectively, so that their property shall extend to the river opposite to the lands that are laboured by them in the same manner that the laboured grounds belong to them respectively, with this qualification, that notwithstanding of the exclusive property upon the foresaid greens determined as above, each heritor and his tenants shall have a right of loaning upon one anothers' property of the foresaid greens, in so far as is or shall be necessary for carrying manure to their respective lands and possessions, and that either from the river or from their several steadings or dwellings."

No. 162.

July 14, 1876.
Baroness Gray v. Richardson and Others.

If the principal estate belonging to the parties had been held pro indiviso I need hardly say that the portions of commonty or common property allocated to each, in respect of their pertinential rights, would have been declared or appointed to be pro indiviso also. In place of this the portions allocated to each are so allocated "in full property," and what had been previously divided (probably by march-stones only) is declared to be property also. Each party who was designed in the submission as proprietor of the half lands of Inchyra is described in the decreet-arbitral as the heritor of the particular lands (that is, the particular kavels) to which the newly divided portions of what had been common were added and attached. All this is utterly inconsistent with the supposition of a pro indiviso title to the whole estate of Inchyra, either in the form of kavels or in any other form.

That portion of the decreet-arbitral which relates to the stripe of greens along the shore is specially valuable and explicit, because it expressly recognises the right of exclusive property of each of the parties in the kavels respectively possessed by each, and totally extinguishes the somewhat startling idea that the enjoyment of centuries, during which leases had been let for terms of years, farm steadings and houses had been built, and large sums expended on fencing, planting, and other improvements, had been under some possessory arrangement merely. The respective portions of the greens opposite the laboured lands of each are declared thenceforth to be the exclusive property of each, "in the same manner that the laboured lands belong to them respectively." It neither has been nor can be alleged that the laboured lands of each thus referred to were other than the kavels stretching down to the shore, which the parties had respectively cultivated and improved for time beyond memory or written record, just as they had improved the kavels farther inland by the expenditure of money in ameliorating the soil, planting trees, building houses, in the manner already mentioned, and upon one of which kavels the mansion-house, kept up and occupied by the Blairs, stood and still stands, or recently did so.

The contract of 21st August and 18th September 1784, and the submission dated 18th March and 4th April 1794, with the decreet-arbitral therein, dated 2d and registered 7th November 1795, likewise bear ample evidence, under the hands of all parties interested, that the different kavels were the exclusive property of the respective parties by whom they had been immemorially possessed. Thus, for instance, the contract binds Lady Gray, after the expiry of the present tacks of her ladyship's part of Inchyra," to grant to Mrs Isobel Blair (wife of the Rev. Thomas Beat) "a valid and formal tack of the two yeards belonging to the said Lady Gray, lying nearest to the mansion-house of Inchyra, the one whereof is presently in the possession of the said Mrs Isobel Blair and Thomas Beat—meaning obviously as tenants of her ladyship—"and the other lying immediately behind, the onstead of houses belonging to the said Mrs Beat, which were lately possessed by James Richardson, her tenant."

No. 162.
July 14, 1876.
Baroness Gray v. Richardson and Others.

And the deed of submission, with a view to the excambion and division thereby authorised of the runrig and rundale lands, as well as of the commonty lands of Inchyra, empowers the arbiters to "appoint a land measurer to measure the lands, distinguishing the parts thereof belonging to the said parties respectively, and to make a plan or plans thereof," and to adjudge the miln, the ferry, and the customs, and timber growing on the lands, to belong to the person to whom the lands on which the same are situated shall be adjudged, "and to fix and determine the value thereof to be given to the other party in land or money, as the said arbiters shall think proper;" and in case any of the then existing houses or steadings and growing timber on the ground of the one party should be adjudged to the other, the arbiters were empowered to decern the one party to pay the value of these houses or steadings and growing timber to the other party.

It was thus mutually acknowledged and declared in probative deeds, duly subscribed by both parties, that the lands possessed by each (personally or by their tenants) were, and had all along been, the separate and exclusive property of each. A plan and measurement, shewing what was thus acknowledged to belong to each, was prepared by Mr Ireland, land-surveyor, by order of the arbiters, as we find from the decree-arbitral, and it is not disputed that what was so shewn embraced and substantially consisted of the kavels regularly alternating with each other, and that these were valued and dealt with by the arbiters as the separate and exclusive property of the respective parties accordingly. If the lands had been held pro indiviso, they could, of course, have been divided at any time, at the suit of either party, at common law. It was just because they were not held pro indiviso that the action which failed in 1782 had been brought on the Act anent runrig. And it was, in like manner, just because they were not held pro indiviso that the contract of September 1794 and the submission of November 1795 were necessary and were entered into. What thus required to be done, although called a division, was truly an excambion, which the common law had no power to compel. That the excambion was of a very substantial description is seen from the fact that the arbiters struck a line of division through the centre of the estate from south to north, whereby all that had belonged to each party on the one side of the line became the property of the other.

If the lands of Inchyra had been held pro indiviso, as the Lord Ordinary holds, or rather assumes them to have been, it would have been very difficult to make out that the fishings were not pro indiviso also. Hence the care (perhaps greater than necessary) with which I have investigated into the title and history of the lands, before entering specially upon the question as to the fishings, which I shall now proceed more directly to consider,—still, however, only as between Lady Gray and the Flemings,—reserving a few further observations, applicable to the title both of the lands and the fishings, which it will save repetition to make once for all when I come to consider the question with Sir John Richardson.

I refrain from quoting again the dispositive clause of the deed of June 1655, describing the subjects conveyed by Sir Alexander Blair to William Blair (Lady Gray's predecessor), because it is easy to refer back to it. It conveys the sunny half of the town and lands of Inchyra, which I shall now assume not to have been a pro indiviso conveyance; next it conveys the half of the miln, with its adjuncts; then "the just and equal half of the salmon-fishings and uthers fish-

No. 162.

July 14, 1876.
Baroness Gray
v. Richardson
and Others.

ings of the saidis landis of Inchyra;" next the ferry, with its boats and privileges, and the boatman's house; and lastly, the teind sheaves or parsonage teinds "of the saidis halff of the landis of Inchyra, and the personage teinds of that rig of land in the said toune of Inchyra pertaining to David Lord Balvaird."

Now, here it will be observed that the words pro indiviso do not occur throughout the dispositive clause. It is true that the conveyance of one-half of the miln and its adjuncts, which immediately precedes the conveyance of the half of the fishings, imports in law a pro indiviso conveyance, but this arises solely from the subject conveyed being indivisible in its nature. That does not seem to afford a very cogent reason for construing the conveyance of one-half of the fishings (which are not indivisible) as pro indiviso also. The conveyance of the ferry, which immediately follows, with the ferry-boats, privileges, and commodities thereof, and the boatman's house, is clearly not a pro indiviso conveyance, for no interest whatever in these subjects is given to Andrew Blair, the disponee of the other half of the lands, by the deed of 2d August immediately following. They are, accordingly, not in his crown-charter of 3d March 1662, but they are in the crown-charter in favour of the heir of William, of 28th February 1673. It was in consequence, no doubt, of this state of the titles that the decreet-arbitral of 1795 found and declared that the right of ferry was to continue with and belong to Lady Gray. It is equally clear that the conveyance of the teinds "of the saidis halff lands of Inchyra," and the teinds of Lord Balvaird's rig, in the town of Inchyra, is not pro indiviso, but exclusive.

In like manner, in the deed just mentioned in favour of Andrew Blair, if we lay out of view the fishings themselves, we find no pro indiviso conveyance of anything except the one-half of the miln and its adjuncts, the conveyance of which falls to be construed as pro indiviso, simply for the reason I have just assigned in analysing the deed in favour of William.

If each of these deeds of 1655, after conveying a just and equal half of the lands of Inchyra, had simply said "with the salmon and other fishings of the said half of the said lands," this, no doubt, would have been a clearer form of expression. But it seems to me to be by no means a very strained construction to hold the words actually used as meaning the same thing,—that is to say, to hold that by the just and equal half of the fishings of Inchyra was meant the half of the fishings connected with the just and equal half thereby conveyed of the lands of Inchyra. But let it be assumed that ex facie of the deed, while as yet nothing had followed upon it, the reasons would considerably preponderate for construing it otherwise: Still, there can be no better evidence of the meaning of an old deed, which it is at all possible to read in two ways, than the construction which, so far as we can discover, the parties interested themselves put upon it at the time and ever since. In the present case the evidence thus afforded is peculiarly strong, because there are here two deeds similarly expressed in favour of two different parties, each of whom has immemorially construed them, rebus ipsis et factis, in the same way. There are, I think, some fourteen or fifteen valuable fishings ex adverso of the different kavels which stretch down to the river. With the exception of some promiscuous fishing at what is called the Hurle Carle, the position of which is admittedly peculiar, none of the fishings have ever been possessed as pro indiviso fishings. The parties have respectively had exclusive possession of the fishings ex adverso of their respective kavels. They have immemorially let these fishings to tenants, laid out money in improving them, and treated them in every way as their separate and exclusive property. The defenders, Mr and Mrs Fleming, retain possession, upon that footing, of what they still call their own fishings. They say in the record (Stat. 3) that the defender, Mrs Fleming, and her predecessors, "have, from time immemorial, or at least for more than forty years, exercised without interruption on the part of the pursuer or any one else the right of salmon-fishing in the river Tay, and that within the limits and bounds marked and pointed out by march-stones placed in the embankment of or near the river, along the whole of the said fishings."

No. 162.
July 14, 1876.
Baroness Gray v. Richardson and Others.

More particularly, they say (Stat. 4) that the defender, Mrs Fleming, and her predecessors, have possessed their fishing called the Hen fishing for time immemorial. And, after mentioning a stone which they say marks the northern boundary of that fishing, they add—"The stone is a very old stone, and indicates the ancient boundary of the said fishing at the time when the greens adjoining the separate kavels of Inchyra still existed;" that is to say, as I understand it, when the greens were not yet divided, and the divided portions thrown into the adjoining kavels, which they were by the decree-arbitral of 1747. In their 6th statement Mr and Mrs Fleming farther say—"The said fishing, known as the Hen, or the Laying Hen, has existed and has belonged to the defenders and their predecessors for more than a century." And in their 7th statement they quote from a different decreet-arbitral, which they allege to have been pronounced in 1757, in a submission between their predecessors and the predecessors of Lady Gray, by which they say it was found "that the parties submitters, as heritors of the two half lands of Inchyra and salmon-fishings thereto belonging, have each a distinct and divided right and possession of the said salmon-fishings belonging to the parties, and lying opposite to the greens adjoining to the different kavels or gliebs of the said lands, and that they and their heirs and successors may continue to possess the said fishings, or any other fishings to be made out by them belonging to the said lands, and to sett, use, and dispose thereon, in a separate and divided manner, in all time coming, as they have done in times past." I quote this only as being adopted by Mr and Mrs Fleming as part of their statements; for we have only an alleged scroll of this submission, and the supposed decreet-arbitral upon it, of 1757, probably never was pronounced.

All this, whatever else may be contended for, is very conclusive of the fact that the defenders, Mr and Mrs Fleming, do not dispute that there has been separate and exclusive possession by the parties respectively of the fishings ex adverso of their own kavels, although they do not admit that the frontage of each kavel is now the precise limit of each fishing, but, on the contrary, contend that the Hen fishing has been extended, by possession, upon the Meadowpows, which is a separate question arising upon the proof led upon that point.

Thus, then, apart altogether from the submission of 1794, and decree-arbitral of 1795, we have the conveyance of the fishings by the deeds of 16th June and 2d August 1655 sufficiently construed as having imported a separate and exclusive and not a pro indiviso conveyance of one-half of the fishings to each of the disponees under these deeds respectively.

That submission and decreet-arbitral are, however, most important documents in this case, and would go far, of themselves, to settle the present dispute, which necessarily involves, not the property of the Meadowpows fishing only, but of the whole fishings which the parties have respectively hitherto enjoyed as the separate and exclusive property of each.

I have already adverted to this deed of submission as regards the lands, and I

No. 162.
July 14, 1876.
Baroness Gray v. Richardson and Others.

now proceed to quote the clause which follows as to the fishings. Reading it in the third person, as it would, of course, be in the deed of submission, it runs thus,—"Reserving always, to both parties, the right of the salmon-fishings on the river Tay respectively belonging to them, according to their present boundaries, and which boundaries are not to be affected by any division that shall be made in consequence hereof; but that the said arbiters, after such division, shall have power to put in march-stones in the ground belonging to either party, to ascertain the boundaries of the salmon-fishings belonging to the parties respectively, which are not to be affected by the said division."

Now, what does this import? Obviously, that, although the kavels were thenceforth to be obliterated, and the lands divided into two portions in place of very many portions, this was not to affect the fishings, which were expressly admitted to be then "belonging to them respectively," according to the existing boundaries, and which boundaries were not to be affected by any division of the lands. The property of each fishing, separately possessed, was thus recognised as separate and exclusive in the person of the party who so possessed it. The boundaries are spoken of as existing boundaries, known to both parties, with less or more precision, although they had not yet been marked out by march-stones; and then follows a power—equally important with the narrative on which it proceeds,—"that the said arbiters shall have power to put in march-stones in the ground belonging to either party to ascertain the boundaries of the salmon-fishings belonging to the parties respectively." Here, then, we have an admission, in one breath, of the exclusive nature of the property of the kavels, and, in the next, of the exclusive nature of the property of the fishings. By empowering the arbiters to put in march-stones to ascertain the boundaries was obviously meant that the arbiters were first to ascertain with precision what the boundaries were, and then to put in march-stones to mark them for the future.

Both functions the arbiters accordingly performed. The seventh finding of the decreet-arbitral is so important that I shall make no excuse for quoting it at length. It is in these terms:—"We reserve to the parties submitters the salmon-fishings on the river Tay repectively belonging to them according to their present boundaries, wherein we have infixed march-stones in the ground; and we also reserve to both parties access to their different fishings, and to draw and dry their nets according to use and wont. We find that the lowest or east-most fishing belongs to Lord Gray, and is altogether opposite to the lands of Pitfour, being bounded to the west by the old march-stone between the lands of Pitfour and Inchyra, which we ordered to be marked number one. That the several fishings between the stones number one and number two, numbers three and four, numbers seven and eight, numbers nine and ten, numbers eleven and twelve, numbers thirteen and fourteen, and numbers fifteen and sixteen, being seven in number, do all belong to the said John Anderson. The stone number sixteen stands in the march between the lands of Inchyra and Ribney. That the several fishings between the stones numbers two and three, numbers four and five, numbers six and seven, numbers eight and nine, numbers ten and eleven, numbers twelve and thirteen, numbers fourteen and fifteen, being also seven in number (besides the fishing opposite to the estate of Pitfour) do all belong to Lord Gray, and that the fishing between the stones numbers five and six, called Hurle Carle, is the joint property of Lord Gray and Mr Anderson; and in terms of the said submission we do hereby declare that the said fishings respectively belonging to each of the said parties shall not be hurt or affected by the division now made of the lands; but that the said fishings shall be enjoyed and possessed according to the rights, custom, and usages heretofore observed by the said parties, their authors and predecessors."

No. 162.

July 14, 1876.
Baroness Gray v. Richardson and Others.

Now, there can be no doubt at all that this seventh finding was within the powers conferred upon the arbiters. The submission sets forth, in substance, that the respective fishings were the property of the respective parties who had hitherto possessed and enjoyed them, according to certain boundaries, in the same way as they had possessed and enjoyed the runrig and rundale lands,—that is to say, the respective kavels. It stipulates that there should be no division, that is to say, no excambion of the fishings as there was to be of the lands, but that, although these fishings would be no longer ex adverso of the kavels belonging to the respective parties, they should continue to be possessed and enjoyed as they had previously been by the parties to whom they respectively belonged. We have thus, in the form of a probative deed, at once the admission and the evidence of the parties themselves, who had the best means of knowledge, of what had been the state of things in time past, as well as a mutual stipulation that, so far as regarded the fishings, the same should continue in time to come.

In fulfilment of the duty devolved upon them by the submission the arbiters did ascertain what had been, and consequently what were the boundaries of the different fishings belonging to the respective parties, and caused march-stones to be set that there might be no mistake about them in future. Following the very language of the submission they reserved these fishings to the respective parties according to these boundaries, and, by an enumeration, without which their duty would have been imperfectly performed, they specified the position of the fishings belonging to each party and the numbers of the march-stones which marked the boundaries of each. In particular, they found "that the lowest or eastmost fishing" (that is, the fishing opposite the Meadowpows) "belongs to Lord Gray, and is altogether opposite to the lands of Pitfour, being bounded to the west by the old march-stone between the lands of Pitfour and Inchyra, which we ordered to be marked number one." Eighty years or thereby elapsed between the date of that decreet-arbitral and the date of raising the present action. We see from the detailed powers and privileges anxiously conferred on the heritable keeper of the water of Tay by the ancient charters in process, that, even in the seventeenth century the salmon-fishings were considered important, but, at same time, it is undoubted that the value of these fishings has only been gradually developed, and that some of the fishings connected with the lands of Inchyra, of which that ex adverso of the Meadowpows is an instance, have only come to be considered valuable in comparatively recent times. But, in so far as there has been fishing at all ex adverso of the lands of Inchyra, the right has been exercised since the date of the decreet-arbitral, in accordance with the rights of parties, as therein set forth, and in a manner inconsistent with the supposition that the fishings ex adverso of the different kavels were or are held under a pro indiviso title. The presumption in fact and in law retro to the date of the two deeds of 1655, being a period of 140 years prior to the date of the decreet-arbitral, is that the possession during that period was equally inconsistent with the supposition of the fishing being held under a pro indiviso title, as it has been during the additional eighty years which have elapsed since the date of that decreet.

I should consequently come to the conclusion that the fishings were not and

No. 162.

July 14, 1876.
Baroness Gray v. Richardson and Others.

are not held under a pro indiviso title, although I had nothing to go upon but the terms of the two deeds of alienation of 1655, and the fact that from that time to this,—a period of 220 years,—the possession has been inconsistent with the supposition of such pro indiviso title.

An ambiguous title may no doubt be construed by possession as a pro indiviso title, but apart from such possession there is no presumption in favour of a pro indiviso title. The law, on the contrary, is hostile to pro indiviso titles, and favourable to their conversion into separate and exclusive titles. Here the fishings are all connected with the lands. They are included in the same titles, and although the words used in the titles had been less open to construction than they are, I could not have construed them in one way where the parties themselves, rebus ipsis et factis, had for between two and three centuries construed them in a different way. And I should come to this conclusion although the submissions, with the decreets-arbitral which followed on then in 1747 and 1795, were to be altogether laid aside, or had never existed.

As to the contention of Mr and Mrs Fleming that the negligence of Lady Gray has enabled them to extend the eastern boundary of their Hen fishing, so as to embrace a portion of the space ex adverso of the Meadowpows down to the stones A B C, it is obvious that before this claim can be entertained it must be held or assumed that the title to the fishings (including the Hen fishing) is not a pro indiviso title. The question of title to be solved necessarily comes to be whether the whole fishings of Inchyra are held pro indiviso? The two parties (Lady Gray and the Flemings) have between them the whole of these fishings. The words in the deeds of 1655, which fall to be construed, comprehend the whole. If these words are held, notwithstanding of the usage, to import a pro indiviso title to the fishing ex adverso of what, down to 1795, was the kavel called Meadowpows, they necessarily import that the title to the fishings ex adverso of the other kavels, including the defenders' title to the Hen fishing, is pro indiviso also. Now, it is superfluous to say that one pro indiviso proprietor cannot, in virtue of his pro indiviso title, prescribe against another pro indiviso proprietor a separate and exclusive right to a portion of the pro indiviso property, which is really what Mr and Mrs Fleming, in this branch of their case, are seeking to do. To call this a question of bar or of personal bar would be a misapplication of words. It is a question of title to an heritable subject and nothing else. If the Lord Ordinary were right in holding that the title to the fishings is pro indiviso his conclusion would be irresistible that "Mr and Mrs Fleming can never acquire, as in a question with the pursuer, an exclusive right to any part of the Inchyra fishings in the face of their own title." Accordingly, if I thought with his Lordship that the title to these fishings is a pro indiviso title, I should be of opinion that the plea of the Flemings that they had acquired a portion of the fishings ex adverso of the Meadowpows, by prescriptive possession, fell to be rejected without entering upon their proof of possession, in respect of the claim being in that view inconsistent with the nature of their own title.

Holding, however, as I do, that each of the two parties has an exclusive title to their separate fishings, I recognise the competency and relevancy of Mr and Mrs Fleming's contention that, by prescriptive possession, they have added the fishing or a portion of the fishing ex adverso of the Meadowpows to their Hen fishing. But then I am of opinion that they have failed to prove that possession. To have the effect contended for the proof of possession would require, by our law, to be clear and unequivocal for the complete period of forty years. I think it is not proved to have been so. I agree upon this point, not only with the result arrived at by the Lord Ordinary, but with his detailed observations upon the proof made in his note, and having had so much to say otherwise I shall add nothing on this particular subject to what has been well said already.

No. 162.

July 14, 1876.
Baroness Gray v. Richardson and Others.

To come now to the case of Sir John Richardson, I take first his claim in virtue of his crown-grant of 1873 to the fishing ex adverso of the Meadowpows, because many of the observations I have already made upon the case between the Flemings and Lady Gray have necessarily an intimate bearing upon that claim. I certainly am of opinion that one pro indiviso proprietor cannot sue a declaratory action as to the common subject without the concurrence of the other or others; and if the title to the Inchyra fishings were held to be a pro indiviso title I think Sir John Richardson would be entitled to have the present action, so far as directed against him, at once dismissed. It has been held that a pro indiviso proprietor may defend his possession against a mere intruder; but it is fixed law that he cannot by himself pursue an action of declarator, which this is, with reference to the title of the common subject. It is true Sir John might take very little by that degree of success. I think he would substantially take nothing. Because, if the title to the respective fishings were not separate and exclusive in each of the two parties (Lady Gray and the Flemings), it would be pro indiviso in these parties jointly, and that would, equally with the other view, exclude the claim of Sir John under his recent crown-grant, because the Crown cannot give out a second time the fishings given out previously, whether in exclusive property or pro indiviso.

But I am of opinion that Lady Gray and the Flemings have each a perfectly good title to the separate and exclusive property of their respective fishings in a question with Sir John and with all the world, and this independently altogether of the submissions and decreets-arbitral to which Sir John was no party, and consequently that Sir John's ground for the total dismissal of Lady Gray's action entirely fails.

Sir John could not well plead ignorance of the terms of Lady Gray's title to the lands and the fishings, even if others could do so, for the progress which constituted that title was and is the identical progress under which he acquired the property of the Meadowpows. But nobody can plead ignorance of the terms of the titles of others which appear, as they do here, on the face of the public record of sasines. As little can anybody plead ignorance of the position and nature of the subjects, the mode in which they have been publicly possessed, and other patent facts which go to explain the title, and which are open to the observation or inquiry of all. For instance, when lands are described, with whatever obscurity, as within certain boundaries, the purchaser or other singular successor must find out the boundaries for himself. If the lands are described simply as being possessed, or as having been formerly possessed, by parties named, he must find out what was then or had formerly been so possessed. If neither boundaries nor possessors are mentioned he must still take the burden of finding out what the lands consist of, and how far the terms of the titles have been affected or explained by what has followed upon them. A familiar and instructive instance of this occurs in the case of a barony, the title to which frequently specifies nothing as to the lands beyond describing them as the lands and barony of A, with the addition of the parish or county within which they are situated. The law thus applicable to lands is, of course, equally applicable to fishings and other heritable subjects; and if the fishings are described, as in this case, as the fishings of certain lands, the inquiry of the purchaser, or other stranger, claiming a right to or interest in the fishings, must be extended to all the particulars relative to the lands which have a bearing upon the right and title to the fishings. Here we have the actual case of a barony to deal with. For by the crown-charter of 3d March 1662, in favour of Andrew Blair, the predecessor of the Flemings, the two quarters which made up one-half of the town and lands of Inchyra together with the half of the fishings, &c., were erected into a barony called the barony of Inchyra. The Lord Ordinary finds that the sunny half of the lands of Inchyra, together with the half of the fishings now belonging to Lady Gray, was incorporated into the barony of Kinfauns by the crown-charter of resignation in favour of Mrs Anne Blair, and her husband Alexander Carnegie, dated 28th February 1673, and this was not, I think, disputed by either party at the hearing, although, owing to blanks in the print of the titles, I have not been able quite satisfactorily to verify the fact for myself, and it is not of moment in this part of the discussion, except as farther illustrating the reasonableness, or rather the necessity, of that principle of our law of conveyancing which will not allow Sir John Richardson or any other stranger to found upon the terms of the titles of Lady Gray and the Flemings without having reference at the same time to the separate and exclusive possession which has publicly followed upon them, and by which they have been immemorially construed and explained.

No. 162.
July 14, 1876.
Baroness Gray v. Richardson and Others.

I therefore require nothing but the terms of the titles and the possession which has followed upon them to exclude Sir John Richardson from claiming the fishings ex adverso of the Meadowpows, in virtue of his crown-grant of 1873, as well as from insisting that, so far as directed against him, Lady Gray's present action should be dismissed. It is not in the least necessary, in order to arrive at these results, that Lady Gray should have possessed the particular fishing ex adverso of the Meadowpows. The fishings, of which she has had separate and exclusive possession (some six or seven in number), are part and portion of the same crown-grant with the fishing ex adverso of the Meadowpows, for it is quite clear that the Meadowpows was part of the lands of Inchyra proper, and not, as Sir John alleges, part of the Prior Lands, which lay apart from all the kavels. The crown-grant of the Inchyra fishings has, therefore, been immemorially possessed upon, and is possessed upon at this hour, both by Lady Gray and by Mr and Mrs Fleming. The Crown has had no possession adverse to that of the original grantees, and in these circumstances the Crown could not, cum effectu, grant to Sir John in 1873 any one or more of the fishings which had been given out to others centuries before.

As regards Sir John Richardson's claim to the Meadowpows fishing, in his capacity of proprietor of the lands of Cairnie, I think it only necessary to say that I agree with the Lord Ordinary, both in the finding on the subject embodied in his interlocutor and in the observations made in his note.

I farther agree with the Lord Ordinary that Sir John Richardson has the property of the fishings ex adverso of his Cairnie property as far west as the line drawn through the three stones A B C, because, to that extent, his Cairnie Island, prior to the embankment, came directly between the Meadowpows and the main channel of the river, and he has not lost any of his frontage by the embankment. I think, further, that it follows from this that Sir John is entitled to be assoilzied from the alternative conclusion of Lady Gray's summons which embraces the space to which his right thus extends.

No. 162.

July 14, 1876.
Baroness Gray v. Richardson and Others.

On this addition being made, and the absolvitor of the Flemings from the action as laid being recalled, I see no objections to the findings in the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor so far as they go. But whether we adopt these findings simpliciter or not, there must, if my opinion be well founded, be an important alteration in the substance of the operative judgment itself, by decerning in favour of the pursuer Lady Gray, and against the defenders, in terms of the last alternative conclusion of the libel.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—The pursuer, Lady Gray of Kinfauns, alleges, and has produced titles to instruct, that she is proprietrix of one-half of the lands of Inchyra, and she claims the exclusive right of salmon-fishing ex adverso of the piece of ground formerly part of Inchyra and now of Pitfour to which the action relates. It is to be observed that the right of salmon-fishing was not conveyed with the lands to Hay of Pitfour, the predecessor of the defender Sir John Richardson. If Sir John has any right to the salmon-fishing opposite to that piece of ground it is not in respect of that conveyance. It is on another title that he claims them.

The other half of the lands of Inchyra appears to have formerly belonged to the Blairs, of the family of Balthayock, and now belongs to the defenders Mrs Fleming and her husband.

It is important to consider the right which, on the titles before us, these two parties, the pursuer and the defenders Fleming, have respectively instructed to the lands of Inchyra. The statements on the record and the pleadings at the bar have not been quite consistent on this point. But, without dwelling at present on that consideration, I am of opinion that the right of Lady Gray, and the right of Mrs Fleming and her husband, under their titles to the lands, are both rights of separate estate, and not rights pro indiviso.

On this point I cannot agree with the Lord Ordinary. On careful consideration of the titles I am humbly of opinion that the rights of both parties respectively to the two halves of the lands of Inchyra are separate rights to separate halves, and are not held pro indiviso.

The pursuer, Lady Gray, has alleged and produced a title to "the just and equal sunny half of all and whole the town and lands of Inchriff, now commonly called Inchyra, with houses, biggings, &c., as the same were occupied and possessed by Andrew Lyell and Allan Peat."

The defenders, Mr and Mrs Fleming, have alleged and produced a title to "All and haill that quarter or fourth part of the town and lands of Inchyra, with houses, biggings, &c., last occupied by James Blair, and now by myself," that is, Sir Alexander Blair of Balthayock, and a second title to the other quarter. We have here in both titles a description of the lands as occupied and possessed by certain individuals named. This of itself indicates a separate estate, and not a pro indiviso estate. But further, and yet more specially, the description of the pursuer's just and equal half as "the sunny half" is conclusive in my opinion of the separate and divided character of the right. If the whole lands were held pro indiviso there could be no sunny half to one of the parties, for the sun would shine equally and the shadows fall equally on the estate of both parties. The description of the half disponed to the pursuer's author is necessarily the description of the divided subject—a subject to be ascertained and known by the physical or natural distinction that it is the side on which the sun shines, perhaps supposed to be the lightest and warmest, like the sunny side of a peach. In the Latin charter founded on by the pursuer the description is solarem dimidietatem, and I think that "sunny half" is clearly the correct translation. In one description of another subject in the titles the words are tam solarem quam umbralem dimidietatem. This contrast of solaris with umbralis, taken along with the obvious derivation of the word, supports the translation "sunny half;" and besides, there is classic authority for the expression arcus solaris, meaning the rainbow or the sunny bow. Taking this view of the expression, I have no doubt that we have here a description of some importance; the half conveyed is distinguished by a special natural or physical peculiarity. It appears to me clear that, taking into view the fact that special occupancy or possession is set forth, and that the one half is described as the sunny half and the other is not, the rights to these lands are separate and not pro indiviso. Nor does the fact that the lands appear to have been possessed in alternate lots or kavels affect my opinion that they are held on separate and not on pro indiviso rights. I look upon the division into lots or kavels as an adjustment for convenience of parties—regulating the mode of possession—but affording no conclusive proof and raising no presumption in favour of a pro indiviso right, but rather the contrary. In the face of these titles, which are not dubious, I could not give effect to the fact of possession by alternate kavels as altering or qualifying the separate rights to the respective halves as they stand on the titles. The pursuer states, as I think erroneously, on the record, and the pleadings were opened accordingly, that the lands of Inchyra were before 1795 held pro indiviso. I am of opinion that on the titles the lands were not and are not held pro indiviso.

No. 162.

July 14, 1876.
Baroness Gray v. Richardson and Others.

I understand Lord Deas to be of opinion that the allocation and possession by kavels was prior to the charters here founded on. That may be so, but, whether it be so or not, I am of opinion that on the words of these charters the rights are separate. I agree with Lord Deas in holding that the right of each party to the lands is, and has been since the charters, separate and not pro indiviso.

But passing from the titles to the land, and coming to the title to the fishings, I have felt the question, whether the right to the fishings was on the old titles separate or pro indiviso, to be attended with more difficulty. Take Lady Gray's title. Immediately following the conveyance of the just and sunny half of the lands is the conveyance of the "just and equal half of the mylne of Inchyra, mylne lands, multures, and sequels of the same." This is the conveyance of a pro indiviso right, for the mylne could not be divided so as to be conveyed in two halves as two separate subjects. There is no dispute about this. But observe the effect of it on the construction of the remainder of the titles. The course or flow of the conveyance in separate parts has thus stopped at the point where the mill is introduced into the title. The description by physical peculiarity is no longer present; the ascertainment of the subject conveyed in halves by specification of the separate occupancy of each of these halves is no longer present. These peculiarities, appropriate in the description of a separate estate, but inappropriate in the description of a pro indiviso right, have been dropped at that point. The words "just and equal half" standing alone without the aid of any reference to any natural feature or boundary or specified possession, or some equivalent, might mean or appear to mean "just and equal half pro indiviso, such a half as is conveyed as regards the mill.

The next subject conveyed is "the just and equal half of the salmon-fishings and other fishings of the said lands of Inchyra." What do these words mean,

No. 162.

July 14, 1876.
Baroness Gray v. Richardson and Others.

reading them as they stand in the context? In the first place, the words are not the salmon-fishings of the just and equal half of the lands as above described. That could easily have been stated if intended, and that would have been the conveyance of a separate right—a right to salmon-fishings ex adverso of the lands. But the words are, the just and equal half of the salmon-fishings of the lands. There is no part of the salmon-fishings of the lands of Inchyra of which the just and equal half is not conveyed. Every portion of this fishing is divided into just and equal halves. No part is exempt from division. If so, the right to each half so conveyed is the right to a pro indiviso half. But still further, the peculiar features by which in the previous clause the several parts were distinguished are dropped in the description of the fishings. I do not know whether the fishing opposite the sunny half is better or worse than the fishing opposite the shady half of Inchyra. Nor do I know whether the fishing opposite the land possessed by Andrew Lyell and Allan Peat is better or worse than the fishing opposite the land possessed by James Blair. But this I do know, that of all the fishing, whether opposite the sunny half or the shady half of the lands, and whether opposite Lyell's possession or Blair's possession, the just and equal half is by this title conveyed. No boundaries of the fishings are specified, nor is any possession referred to, nor any occupant mentioned. Therefore the peculiar marks by which divided property may be distinguished and preserved from confusion are set forth in the description of lands and are withheld in the description of the fishings; and the words selected for describing and conveying the fishings are those which have been used appropriately for conveying the just and equal half of the mill pro indiviso, and are not those which have been used appropriately for conveying the separate, just, and equal half of the lands. It is quite true that the mill is a subject which may be viewed as naturally indivisible, and which could not be conveyed in separate parts, and therefore the use of the words of conveyance pro indiviso, as applicable to the mill, cannot afford much aid in construing the words of conveyance of the fishings. Nor do I rest my opinion chiefly on that circumstance. I rather view the conveyance of the mill as stopping the current of the style used in the previous part of the deed, and so making manifest the change. It is on resuming its flow after the conveyance of the mill that we perceive in the title this peculiarity, that the words of description which prevented the conveyance of the land from being construed as conferring a pro indiviso right have been omitted. If in Lady Gray's title the sunny half had not been mentioned, and if the occupancy or possession by persons named had not been stated, the words of the title to the lands might have been otherwise construed, and might have imported a conveyance of a just and equal pro indiviso half of the lands. It is because of the peculiarity of the description that this construction cannot be adopted. But the style is changed in regard to the fishings. The peculiar words which gave a character of separate distinctiveness to the description of the halves of the land are omitted in the description of the fishings, and I think that the import and effect of the conveyance of the fishings, and of the pursuer's title built on that conveyance, is therefore different.

The terms of the defender Mrs Fleming's title to the other half of the lands of Inchyra are so similar as regards description that it seems scarcely necessary for me to advert to them particularly. These defenders have a title to two quarters making the other half of Inchyra. Their half is not indeed called the sunny half. That pleasant description is confined to the pursuer's half. But the absence of the word by which the pursuer's half is so attractively described is of itself an indication of a natural distinction between the two, and a natural feature in both, the one being the sunny half and the other the half that is not the sunny half. The occupancy of the lands of the defenders is stated to be by James Blair, but a pro indiviso right cannot be well described by stating the occupancy of a part. Then the just and equal half of the mill is conveyed in the same terms as in the pursuer's title, terms expressive of a pro indiviso half, and then the just and equal half of the fishings of Inchyra is conveyed—not the salmon-fishings of half the lands—but the just and equal half of the salmon-fishings of the whole lands—the equal division attaching to every part of the salmon-fishings opposite every portion of the lands on the river. It may, however, be noticed here that the lands appear to have been again sub-divided, so that while one-half is conveyed to the pursuer, two separate quarters, making between them the other half, were acquired by the defenders. The fishings, on the other hand, are conveyed to the pursuer and to the defenders as in each case "the just and equal half." I think that at the time when the submission and award were adopted as a means of adjustment and division there does not appear to have been any sub-division of the halves of the fishings. Each title sustains throughout, until the arbitration procedure commenced, a right to a just and equal half of the whole fishings of the whole lands.

No. 162.

July 14, 1876.
Baroness Gray v. Richardson and Others.

These observations tend to confirm my view that in the title of both the parties the just and equal half of the fishings was conveyed to Lady Gray and to Mrs Fleming respectively as a pro indiviso right. It was so originally on the construction of the title, and it remained so until in some manner divided.

But a division was possible, and indeed probable. I think, indeed, that our law, though it acknowledges, yet does not favour, the permanent maintenance of pro indiviso rights. I can scarcely doubt that the proprietors of the two halves of the fishings of Inchyra on pro indiviso right could legally and effectually obtain, either judicially by process of division, or by arbitration and award, or by mutual arrangement and contract, if sufficiently instructed, the division and adjustment of their pro indiviso rights for their mutual satisfaction and convenience. Indeed I think that facilities for division are afforded by law, and that evidence of such adjustment and division of joint rights of fishing of which the permanent maintenance must be inconvenient, should be carefully and even favourably considered by the Court.

The result of my consideration of the evidence adduced to instruct the adjustment and division of the fishings is, that they have been divided, and that the pro indiviso rights of fishing have now ceased, and been succeeded and superseded by separate and exclusive rights.

Now, we have here important procedure in submissions between the respective authors of the pursuer and the defenders Fleming. I do not think that the pleadings by one or other of the parties to these arbitrations, or the adjusted admissions of both these parties in combination, or even the award or decree issued by the arbiters, can be held as directly affecting the rights of Sir John Richardson, the other defender. In regard to him the whole of these proceedings were res inter alios acta,—what either party said in these proceedings while in contest with each other cannot be evidence against Sir John. Nor can what both parties agreed to accept as a fact in their contest be held as a proof of the fact in a question with him. The concurrence of both is no more binding on him than the act of either. There is a view, to which I shall afterwards advert, on which the issue of the arbitration, if it be found to be a division of the rights of fishing, may indirectly affect the interest of Sir John. But in the meantime I think we must deal with the proceedings in the submission as affecting the rights of Lady Gray on the one hand and Mr and Mrs Fleming on the other hand.

I do not dwell on the earlier submissions, because we have no authentic and probative award before us. I proceed at once to the submission in 1794 between William Lord Gray on the one part, proprietor of half of the lands of Inchyra, and John Anderson, W.S., as proprietor of the other half, and representing the interest now in the defender, Mrs Fleming. That was a submission to Mr Proctor of Glamis and Mr Hunter of Glencarse. It is true that the division of the fishings ex adverso of the lands of Inchyra was not committed to the decision of the arbiters by the deed of submission. There was a reservation in the following terms:—"Reserving always to both parties the right of the salmon-fishings in the river Tay respectively belonging to them according to their present boundaries, and which boundaries are not to be affected by any division that may be made in consequence thereof, but that the said arbiters after such division shall have power to put in march-stones in the ground belonging to either party to ascertain the boundaries of the salmon-fishings belonging to the parties respectively, which are not to be affected by the said division." Even under this submission with the reservation in it, it is plain that the arbiters were expected, and indeed desired, to put in march-stones to ascertain the boundaries of the salmon-fishings, a proceeding scarcely necessary or even intelligible if the fishings of both parties were held on pro indiviso right, and were to continue undivided. There can be no boundaries defining the mutual rights of pro indiviso proprietors, as each possesses the half of all. But further, I think that the parties to this submission of 1794 could enlarge the apparent scope of the submission by bringing within it still more clearly and more effectually, for the practical purpose of division, the question of boundary of the fishings and the proceeding of setting up march-stones to denote the boundaries. Accordingly, it appears that the parties did bring the subject specially under the notice of the arbiters. The authors of Mr and Mrs Fleming alleged throughout the pleadings in this submission, not a joint right to all the fishings, but a separate and exclusive right to certain fishings, and, in particular, to an important and valuable fishing known as the "Hen" fishing. This assertion of exclusive and separate right is quite inconsistent with the plea urged at the bar in favour of a pro indiviso right. The pleading, as I have already noticed, has not been consistent on this point. The defenders Fleming have not in this record alleged a pro indiviso right, and their pleas in law as well as their statements of fact are at variance with such an argument. Besides, they concurred in seeking specification and division by the setting down of march-stones to denote the boundaries of the fishings, and that was done.

Then we have the extract registered decree-arbitral, dated 2d and recorded 7th November 1795, in which the arbiters state, that while reserving to the parties submitters the salmon-fishing respectively belonging to them "according to their present boundaries, wherein we have fixed march-stones in the ground," proceed to give a series of distinct findings in regard to the fishings of both parties respectively, as indicated by the march-stones infixed by them for the purpose. I think, as Lord Deas does, that the arbiters had power to pronounce this award, and have effectually pronounced it. Now, this decision was recognised and accepted and acted on by both parties, and I agree entirely with Lord

No. 162.

July 14, 1876.
Baroness Gray v. Richardson and Others.

Deas on the importance of this arbitration and award. I think it was a division effectually carried out by award and the fixing of marches. I have really no doubt that whatever possession has taken place since 1795 has been, not on the footing of pro indiviso rights of fishing, but on the footing of separate rights to separate halves of the fishings of Inchyra, as ascertained and divided by the march-stones set down by the arbiters for the purpose of such division. The defenders Fleming possessing the "Hen" fishing and other fishings as separate rights under this proceeding, whereby the boundaries were ascertained, cannot possibly plead that the rights of the proprietors of the two halves are pro indiviso. To them at least the award which they craved, and which they accepted, and in accordance with which they have possessed, in so far as they have possessed at all, must be conclusive.

The lands of Meadowpows had been given by Lady Gray in excambion to Mr Hay of Pitfour, but the salmon-fishing ex adverso of Meadowpows was not included in the excambion. It remained a portion, and the eastmost portion, of the fishings of Lady Gray, though the land had been conveyed and had ceased to be a portion of her estate. It is just the fishing opposite that piece of ground which forms the subject of the present action. In my view the fishing opposite this piece of ground not having been conveyed with the land to Hay of Pitfour, remained the property of Lady Gray, who, as proprietor of the land and the fishing, had disponed the land, but retained the fishing.

In regard to the march-stones, I think that the old stone with an "I" on the one side and a "P" on the other must be held as one of the march-stones placed by directions of the arbiters, and that it is a fishing boundary, the "I" standing for Inchyra on the west side of the stone, and the "P" standing for Pitfour on the east side of the stone. The letters A B C indicate the remaining line of the boundary, which is according to the contention of Lady Gray.

An attempt was made by the defenders Fleming to prove possession further down the river beyond and contrary to this boundary. I concur with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that this attempt has not been successful, and that the preponderance of evidence back for more than forty years, and as near as it can be brought to the award of 1795, is in favour of the pursuer. I think, as the Lord Ordinary does, that the testimony of the witnesses for the pursuer is the most distinct and reliable, though I do not doubt the honesty of the witnesses on either side.

Accordingly, viewing this case as between the pursuer, and the defenders Fleming, I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be recalled, and that the pursuer is entitled to decree of declarator, conform to the second or alternative conclusion of the summons.

In regard to the case against Sir John Richardson, I am of opinion (1) that Sir John has instructed right to the salmon-fishings in the Tay situated ex adverso of his property as far west or up the river as a line drawn through the points indicated by the three stones A B C to the centre of the river. To that extent he is entitled to absolvitor. Beyond this and to the west of this I do not think that Sir John can on the merits and on the proof resist the alternative conclusions of this action at the instance of Lady Gray. On the effect of the usage and understanding of the fishers on the Tay in regard to the sweep of the net from the western point of Sir John's Cairnie property I express no opinion, except that we have no sufficient proof of such usage, but that, I think, usage, when ascertained, should be respected.

No. 162.
July 14, 1876.
Baroness Gray v. Richardson and Others.

His title to the lands of Cairnie, with the salmon-fishings belonging thereto, is not sufficient of itself to sustain his defence against the conclusions of the pursuer's action, and I am not able to perceive that he has instructed such possession of fishings above the line A B C as can, with reference to his Cairnie title, support his claim. The pursuer's right appears to me to be clear on the titles, and not to have been parted with, and Sir John's opposing right is not supported by sufficient proof of possession contrary to hers.

A recent title from the Crown has been obtained by Sir John in 1873, but that title from the Crown is granted under the declaration and express stipulation that the conveyance should in no way prejudice the rights of any person who may claim right to the salmon-fishing, provided such person shall produce a valid and effectual title thereto complete anterior to the grant. If Lady Gray's title be, as I think it is, valid and effectual, it cannot be prejudiced by this recent grant from the Crown.

I do not think that in the result of my opinion I differ from Lord Deas, for I also hold that the lands have never been held pro indiviso since the charters of 1662, and that the fishings are not now held pro indiviso, and have not been so held since the decree, and the acceptance of the decree of 1795.

It is right that I should advert to a point of form in reference to the conclusion against Sir John Richardson.

The action is laid on the footing of the right of the pursuer to the fishing being separate and exclusive.

On the titles produced, read without reference to the arbitration, the right to the fishing is pro indiviso, though the right to the land is separate and exclusive. The arbitration proceedings and award are equivalent to an adjustment and division and ascertainment of boundaries, and such is their effect in this action as in a question with the defenders Fleming. It is settled that one pro indiviso proprietor cannot pursue alone an action of declarator with reference to the common property. A defender is entitled to protection against such an action. Here the pursuer has called as a defender the other pro indiviso proprietor, who has appeared and defended. The pursuer has, in my view, instructed a division of the property, so that her right is now separate and exclusive. It is not therefore against the pursuer as a pro indiviso proprietor, but against the pursuer as a separate and exclusive proprietor, that the defender Sir John Richardson is now called on to defend his claim to the salmon-fishing. The effect of calling the Flemings as defenders, and the effect of the decision against the defenders Fleming, is to put an end to the plea otherwise competent to Sir John, that one of two pro indiviso proprietors could not alone sue such an action as this. In my view this point, which is technical, could now have no other effect than to delay proceedings and protract litigation; and therefore I disregard it. I think the plea might otherwise have been competent to Sir John. But I think that, in respect of the decree against the defenders Fleming, the pursuer's right is now separate and not pro indiviso, and the plea may be fairly set aside as inapplicable.

The result is that, in my opinion, the pursuer is entitled to decree of declarator as concluded for to the extent I have already explained, except in so far as regards Sir John Richardson's right to salmon-fishings ex adverso of his lands as far west as a line through the points indicated by the stones A B C.

LORD MURE.—I concur in the result which your Lordships have arrived at.

No. 162.
July 14, 1876.
Baroness Gray v. Richardson and Others.

I shall content myself with stating as shortly as I can the grounds on which I have arrived at that conclusion. I cannot concur with the Lord Ordinary that the title of these parties is a pro indiviso title. It is plainly not a pro indiviso title to the lands in the ordinary sense of that word. For it is not a pro indiviso conveyance per expressum, nor is it a conveyance of an equal half of the whole subject; but it is a conveyance of one-half as possessed by particular parties, thereby shewing that at the date of these titles, in 1655, the conveyance to each of the parties was of a separate and distinct portion of the whole. The title to the fishings, looking to the express words of the deeds, is somewhat different. It is more like the usual phraseology of a conveyance pro indiviso; and if called upon to construe it at the time it was granted I should have had difficulty in holding that it was not a pro indiviso title to the fishings. But the language is peculiar, and as it occurs in a part of the deed where there are conveyances of various subjects other than the fishings or the lands, and is so worded as in some respects to be ambiguous, it may, I think, admit of being cleared up by the possession and the actings of the parties under it. For I have no doubt that in construing a title of this description we are entitled to take into consideration the possession and the actings of the parties following upon it. That I apprehend to be a well-known rule of law in disposing of questions of this sort. It was so laid down by Lord Wynford in the case of Macdonald against Heriot's Hospital, in the House of Lords, in which he said:—"Old writings might be expounded by contemporaneous usage, and there can be no means of getting at the meaning of old instruments so satisfactorily as that of seeing how the parties acted under them at the time they were made, and have since continued to act." Lord Brougham expresses a similar opinion with reference to the construction of Acts of Parliament in the case of the Magistrates of Dunbar, 1 Shaw and M'Lean, 134; and with reference to the rules adopted in England there is the opinion of Lord St Leonards in the case of the Attorney-General v. Drummond, 1 Drury and Warren, p. 368, in which his Lordship says:—"One of the most settled rules of law for the construction of ambiguities in ancient documents is that you must resort to contemporaneous usage to ascertain the meaning of a deed. Tell me what you have done under such a deed, and I will tell you what it means." Now, applying these rules to the circumstances of the present case, I think it quite clear, upon the evidence afforded by the various documents that have been founded upon on both sides, to which Lord Deas has referred, that these fishings have never been possessed pro indiviso; and with the exception of what is called the Hurle Carle fishing, which in all the proceedings seems to have been dealt with differently from the rest, there is, in so far as we can see, no evidence of any other portion of the fishing ever having been possessed pro indiviso. In the submission relative to them which took place in 1756, and to which the scroll of the decree-arbitral applies, they are spoken of as separate and divided rights; and I find it stated, in answer for Mr and Mrs Fleming to the third article of the condescendence for the pursuer that "the proprietors of the two half lands of Inchyra, and salmon-fishings thereto belonging, had each of them a distinct and divided right and possession of the salmon-fishings belonging to them, and that this was found by a decree-arbitral pronounced in 1757 in a submission between the parties to Lord President Craigie and Lord Prestongrange." Now, these words "distinct and divided right and possession of the salmon-fishings belonging to them," are the very words of the decree-arbitral, and from that date down to 1795, when the second submission was entered into,

No. 162.

July 14, 1876.
Baroness Gray v. Richardson and Others.

the same distinct and divided right and possession appears to have been continued. The arbiters under the decree-arbitral of 1795 were not to settle the rights of parties as respects the fishings, but they were to fix the boundaries of the fishings as at that date; and, in my opinion, it is impossible to read the terms of that decree-arbitral without coming to the conclusion that the portion of the river Tay here in dispute was assumed, and expressly declared at that time, to belong to and to have for long belonged to Lord Gray. It is described as the eastmost fishing, that is, to the east of the Hen fishing, now belonging to Mrs Fleming, and as belonging to Lord Gray, "and altogether opposite the lands of Pitfour, being bounded to the west by the old march-stone between the lands of Pitfour and Inchyra, which we ordered to be marked numbered one." And when we now find a march-stone at the march between the estates of Inchyra and Pitfour, at about the very place where the arbiters appointed it to be placed, I think we may assume that that is the march-stone which they put there, and that the stone a hundred yards down the river, which is founded on by the defenders in this case as that march-stone, cannot be held to be the march-stone of the Hen fishing as fixed by the decree-arbitral of 1795. I agree with the Lord Ordinary in his observations on this point, and, looking to the terms of the decree-arbitral, I think that we are bound to hold that the march-stone at the boundary of the estate is the march-stone which is the boundary of the original Hen fishing. Now, that being the case, I can see no grounds on which the defenders can successfully maintain that Lady Gray is not the owner of the fishings in the portion of the river Tay in question which are opposite the Meadowpows, and which her title, as explained by these proceedings, gives her an express right to, because her grant is an express grant of salmon-fishing, and the portion of the fishing that belongs to her has been assumed as fixed by that decree-arbitral in 1795 in a question with the predecessors of the defenders. It is said by Mrs Fleming, as I understand, that she has acquired by prescription a right to extend the boundary of her fishing called the Laying Hen, and that she has established a prescriptive right down to the line A B C, which is in question here. Now, I cannot help looking on that decree-arbitral of 1795 as a document which is so worded as to make it very difficult to hold that a party who founds on it as explaining where her share of the fishings in the river were, can be allowed to found upon it to that extent, and yet not to be bound by it in other respects. That decree-arbitral is the proof of who the party is to whom the Hon fishing belongs. It was founded upon by Mrs Fleming as shewing the nature of her right in the action between her and Sir John Richardson, decided in 1871; and it was referred to by the Judges in that case as shewing that Mrs Fleming was in the position of having a separate right to certain portions of the fishings in the river, and she founds upon it to the same effect in this action. Now, if it is necessary for her to found on that deed, and I think it is, in order to shew what her portion of this divided fishing is, it is very difficult to say that she can be entitled to maintain that she can go beyond the boundary fixed by that deed as the boundary of her fishing. It comes very much within the principle of the rules applicable to prescription in the case of a bounding charter, and it is in that view an attempt to prescribe against her own title. Even in such a case as this, where it is not on the deed itself that the question is raised, but on that deed coupled with a decree-arbitral acted on by the parties, I should not, as at present advised, be prepared to hold that one of these parties could in the face of such a title acquire by prescription any extension of boundary in a question

No. 162.
July 14, 1876.
Baroness Gray v. Richardson and Others.

with the party holding the coterminous property. But without proceeding on that strict ground, I concur with the Lord Ordinary, and also with Lord Deas and Lord Ardmillan, that there is no such evidence of exclusive possession by Mrs Fleming of the portion of the water to the east of the march boundary fixed in 1795 as can enable her to maintain that she had acquired by prescription a right to go beyond that line. If that be so, then Lady Gray's title, as explained by what has followed upon it, gives her an express grant of the salmon-fishings of the portion of the river Tay opposite the Meadowpows; and that being so, I think the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor ought to be recalled as regards the question between Lady Gray and Mrs Fleming; and that Lady Gray is entitled to prevail on that part of the case—not to the full extent that she claims in the first conclusion of her summons, but to the extent which the Lord Ordinary points at in his interlocutor under the alternative conclusion. The summons concludes for 120 yards, but there is some evidence to the effect that in the old action the question in dispute was 86 yards. But to the extent of one or other of these lines she is entitled to have decree.

The case of Sir John Richardson as laid on record is, that the action is unfounded, in respect that the defender, in virtue of his titles to the lands of Cairnie, and the salmon-fishings and others aforesaid, and, separatim, in respect of his possession under the said titles, has the sole and exclusive right to the salmon-fishings at that place. Now, I think Sir John Richardson is entitled to the exclusive right of the salmon-fishings ex adverso of the portion of the river where the island of Cairnie was. As I understand, the line which the Lord Ordinary refers to, the line A B C, it is somewhat to the westward of the westmost point of Cairnie Island at low water, and in that way, by the line now given to Lady Gray, Sir John Richardson gets right to fish as far up the river as he would have fished if the island of Cairnie had not been joined to the mainland as it is now. Looking to the plan; it appears to me that the line now fixed with Lady Gray is about the same line as that of the original Cairnie fishing, and to the east of that line I think he is entitled to exclusive possession, subject, it may be, to the custom of the Tay as to the sweep of the net beyond that line. I do not know whether the conclusions of this action point to leaving that open; but that is a matter of detail to be considered in dealing with the terms of the decree. In the recent case of Hay v. The Town of Perth this Division of the Court[1] qualified a line fixed by them, making it subject to the custom of the Tay, and it is for your Lordships' consideration whether for safety's sake some such words should not be inserted in the decree disposing of this case. But I think Sir John Richardson's right to any other portion of the fishing claimed under his first plea in law in respect of possession was disposed of in the former action. It is the very plea maintained in the question raised between him and Mrs Fleming in this Court and in the House of Lords. But since the date of that decision a new title has been got from the Crown, with an express grant. And the case now raised by Sir John, as I understand it, is that under this deed he has acquired an express grant from the Crown. But this express grant is qualified by the important words to be found in the print, by which he only gets the right if there is no one else who can shew that they hold a prior grant to the salmon-fishings at that particular place. Now, in the view I take of the case, Lady Gray has that prior right, because it has been now held, as between Lady Gray and Mrs Fleming, that Lady Gray has right to the sal-

[1] Dec. 20, 1861, 24 D. 230, H.L. May 12, 1863, 1 Macph. 41, 35 Scot. Jur. 463.

No. 162.

July 14, 1876.
Baroness Gray
v. Richardson
and Others.

mon-fishings at that particular portion of the lands of Meadowpows which are immediately to the east of the Hen fishing, and that she holds them under an express grant of salmon-fishing. This was disputed on the part of Sir John Richardson, on the ground that the Meadowpows was a part, not of the estate of Inchyra, to which the express grant of salmon-fishings applied, but of another estate called Prior Lands, belonging to the Gray family, which had no right of fishing; and it was contended that there never was any right of fishing belonging to the Gray family opposite the lands of Meadowpows—Meadowpows being part of Prior Lands. But after having carefully considered the argument adduced in support of this plea, and examined the whole of the titles, and looked at the different plans, the conclusion I come to is the same as that arrived at by the Lord Ordinary and your Lordships, viz., that there is nothing in these deeds, or in the situation of the lands, that can be held to lead to the inference that this water was not held under the Inchyra title but under the title of Prior Lands. I think that in this respect Sir John Richardson has failed, and that the pursuer is entitled to prevail in a question with him, excepting as to that part of the river which is immediately ex adverso of what was known as the Cairnie Island, before that island was joined to the north bank of the river.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I understand your Lordships are all of opinion that Lady Gray, the pursuer of the action, is entitled to a decree of declarator to the effect that she has the sole and exclusive right to the salmon-fishing in the Tay ex adverso of the westmost portion of the Meadowpows, being that portion which lay to the westward of the westmost point of Cairnie Island before it was embanked and added to the land opposite it; and also that she is entitled to judgment in terms of the other auxiliary conclusion of the summons to a corresponding extent. In the proposed judgment I concur; but as I have experienced considerable difficulty in reaching this result, and as my opinion is perhaps founded upon slightly different grounds from those at least of some of your Lordships, I think I should hardly be discharging my duty if I did not endeavour to express briefly what the precise grounds of my opinion are. I may say, at the outset, that as regards the pretensions of Sir John Richardson to the fishings ex adverso of the portion of Meadowpows which I have endeavoured to describe, I think these are not well founded. I think he has not shewn by words or otherwise that these fishings are within his Cairnie title, and I think that his recent grant from the Crown affords him no title to these fishings, because a valid and effectual grant of the same fishings had been long ago made along with the lands of Inchyra, whatever may be the nature of the title under which these fishings are held by proprietors of Inchyra. But, then, the question raised—at least, the chief question raised—by the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, comes to be a question of title. His Lordship holds that the title which Lady Gray has to the fishings ex adverso of the portion of Meadowpows which I have already specified is a pro indiviso title merely, and therefore that she is not entitled to prevail in a conclusion of declarator of the sole and exclusive right either against the other pro indiviso proprietor, Mrs Fleming, or against her neighbour to the east, Sir John Richardson. The history of this estate of Inchyra is somewhat peculiar, but it is not necessary to go back, and, indeed, we have not the means of going back, further than the year 1647, at which time we find that it was held under a crown-charter in favour of Sir Thomas Blair of Balthayock along with a variety of other lands therein contained. The description of Inchyra in that charter is as follows:—"Totas et integras terras de Inchirref cum molendino earundem

No. 162.

July 14, 1876.
Baroness Gray v. Richardson and Others.

terris molendinariis multuris et sequelis solit et consuet cum piscariis salmonum et aliis piscariis dict terrarum de Inchirreff domibus edificiis," &c. And the quæquidem to these lands is thus—"Quæquidem terre de Inchirreff cum pertinen earundem supra mentionat perprius ad Gilbertum comitem de Errol hereditarie pertinuerunt." Now, it is quite clear that Sir Thomas Blair possessed the entire estate of Inchyra and the entire salmon-fishings of the estate of Inchyra, by which must be meant, in the absence of any evidence shewing the contrary, the entire salmon-fishings in the water of Tay opposite to the lands of Inchyra. It also appears that the estate with its fishings had been held as an undivided estate at an earlier period by the Earl of Erroll, and therefore it does not appear to me that there is any reason to suppose that the division of this estate into kavels, as we find it afterwards possessed, had occurred prior to the date of this charter of 1647. There is no evidence to shew that the estate ever had been divided in any way prior to 1647, in which year it is possessed as a single and undivided estate by Sir Thomas Blair. But then there is no doubt that it was divided by Sir Alexander Blair, who appears, I think, to have been Sir Thomas' son, in the year 1655. There are two deeds in that year, the one of which was in favour of William Blair of Tarsappie, and is dated 16th June 1655, by which Sir Alexander Blair conveys to him all and haill the just and equal sunny half of all and haill the town and lands of Inchyra, with houses, biggings, yards, orchards, tenements, &c., as the same is presently occupied and possessed by Andrew Lyell and Allan Peat, with the just and equal half of the mill of Inchyra, mill lands, multures, and sequels of the same used and wont, with the just and equal half of the salmon-fishings and other fishings of the said lands of Inchyra, and all and haill the passage upon the water of Tay with the ferry and the ferry-boat, &c., and all and whole the teind sheaves and parsonage teinds of the said haill lands of Inchyra and the parsonage teinds of a certain rigg of land in addition. Now, I do not entertain any doubt that what was conveyed by this disposition was one-half of the lands of Inchyra, known as the sunny half of these lands, and the limits of which were ascertained on this disposition by the occupation of the lands at that time—at the time of granting the disposition—by two persons called Lyell and Peat. Whether these lands were the eastmost half of the lands of Inchyra, which the term sunny would rather lead one to suppose, or whether the lands had been possessed by Lyell and Peat and by certain other persons mentioned in the conveyance of the other half, in that form in which we see they were possessed afterwards, it is impossible exactly to ascertain, but there is nothing in either of the two conveyances of the year 1655 to preclude the supposition that while the title to the estate of Inchyra was an undivided title in the person of Sir Thomas Blair and his son Sir Alexander, the possession by the tenant might have been a possession by kavels; and if that were so, then the effect of this disposition in favour of William Blair of Tarsappie would be to give him the alternate kavels possessed by Andrew Lyell and Allan Peat. The other disposition of the same date, or nearly of the same date—for it is upon the 2d of August of the same year—gives to Andrew Blair of Inchyra all and haill that quarter or fourth part of the town and lands of Inchyra, with houses, biggings, yards, &c., last occupied by James Blair and now by myself, lying within the sheriffdom of Perth, and all and sundry the teind sheaves, &c., and also all and haill the other quarter or fourth part of all and haill the said town and lands of Inchyra, with houses, biggings, yards, orchards, &c., with the just and equal half of the mill of Inchyra, and with the just and equal half of the salmon and other fishings in the said lands of Inchyra. There is no particular evidence at a subsequent date of any division of the estate into kavels, and I think it is not an unreasonable supposition, but probably the most reasonable supposition that can be made in the circumstances, that the division of the estate as regards title into alternate kavels originated in a possession of that kind by tenants under the proprietor of the whole undivided estate. But whether that be so or not, I am very clearly of opinion that this estate was not given out by Sir Alexander Blair in equal undivided halves, but was given out in distinct and separate halves, and has been possessed and held ever since that time as divided halves of the estate of Inchyra. But then, as regards the fishings, they stand in a very different position. It must be observed that the sunny half of Inchyra, as possessed by certain persons named, is a half of Inchyra, which may or may not be precisely the one just and equal half; and it seems to me that when you have the words "just and equal half" of a subject, and without any other description whatever, it is almost impossible to resist the conclusion that what is intended to be conveyed is a pro indiviso half. If there is nothing to discriminate between one half of an estate and the other half of an estate, as existing in rerum natura, either by boundary or possession or in some other manner, how are you to ascertain which of the two halves is intended to be conveyed? and if in the conveyance you have no other words than these, "I give, grant, and dispone one just and equal half" of such and such a subject, I think it is very difficult indeed to interpret it in any other way than as a conveyance of half of the subject pro indiviso. Now, how stood the fishings? In the first of the two dispositions they are given out in these words,—"The just and equal half of the salmon-fishings and other fishings of said lands of Inchyra." If it was intended to give the fishings of the sunny half of Inchyra, most assuredly these words would have been used, or if it was intended to give one-half of the fishings as distinguished from another half of the fishings by local situation or by possession, such words would have been used as are used in the very same dispositive clause with reference to the lands. But as regards the fishings, we have absolutely nothing except the use of the words "the just and equal half of the salmon-fishings," and in the case of the other half of the estate it is even more remarkable to observe the difference between the two parts of the dispositive clause, for the lands are given out in two separate quarters. There is, first of all, that quarter of the lands "occupied by James Blair and now by myself;" then there is that other quarter or fourth part of the lands of Inchyra "presently occupied and possessed by Gilbert Lyell;" but the fishings are given not as two-fourths, not first one-fourth of the fishings and then another fourth of the fishings, but as one-half of the fishings—not the fishings of the two-fourths, not the fishings of the half of the lands of Inchyra—but the just and equal half of the fishings of Inchyra, that is, the entire estate of Inchyra. I am therefore of opinion that, in so far as these titles are concerned, what the disponees of Sir Alexander Blair got was, each of them, a pro indiviso half of the salmon-fishings and other fishings in the water of Tay of the entire estate of Inchyra, and the terms of the titles have never varied. The pursuer of this action is to the present day infeft in the same terms, and therefore, so far as the titles are concerned, there cannot be the least doubt in my mind that the pursuer would be a pro indiviso proprietor of the salmon-fishings to the extent of one-half.

No. 162.
July 14, 1876.
Baroness Gray v. Richardson and Others.

But there are a number of very instructive facts connected with the history of these fishings, constituting, I think, a contract between the two pro indiviso proprietors of the entire fishings, and by which both of them are bound to the present day. At an early period there seem to have occurred disputes between them as to the way in which these fishings should be possessed; and accordingly in the year 1756 there was an action brought by the Lady Gray of that day in the Court of Session against the Blairs of Inchyra and Mr Blair of Balthayock, who had then also an interest in the other half of the estate of Inchyra, concluding that it should be found and declared that the pursuers have the good and undoubted right to the half of the whole salmon-fishings of the said lands of Inchyra, and that the defenders have no exclusive right to any particular fishings thereon, and that the defenders should be ordained to desist from appropriating to themselves any particular fishings of the said lands. Now, it appears to me that unless there was something to bar the pursuer of that action from insisting in that conclusion, she must have prevailed in it. But observe what took place. The process was judicially referred apparently to the Lord President and Lord Prestongrange; and the two arbiters seem to have come to a provisional conclusion at all events as to what the rights of the parties should be, for we have a scroll decree-arbitral bearing as its date the year 1757, and by that the arbiters proposed to find that "the parties submitters, as holders of the two half lands of Inchyra and salmon-fishings thereto belonging, have, each of them, a distinct and divided right and possession of the said salmon-fishings belonging to the parties, and lying opposite to the greens adjoining to the different kavels or glebes of the said lands, and that they and their heirs and successors may continue to possess the said fishings or any other fishings to be made out by them belonging to the said lands, and to sett, use, and dispone thereon in a separate divided manner in all time coming as they have done in times past, unless the parties submitters or their heirs and successors shall find it their mutual interest, and shall agree, to alter the manner of possession; in which event the arbiters find that they may possess the same, and sett, use, and dispone thereon in a joint and divided manner if they shall think it convenient; and the arbiters further find and declare that the said Margaret Lady Gray has the only good and undoubted right to the passage or passage place of the water of Tay, called the Ferry of Inchyra, with the passage boats and privileges of the same." Now, if that decree-arbitral had been executed—if the parties had not objected to this scroll, and the decree-arbitral had been executed—it would certainly have settled the possession at all events between these parties in all time coming, reserving to them, as it does, to revert, if they shall both agree to it, to the mutual and undivided manner of possession. But it is quite plain from the documents before us, independently altogether of the absence of any final decree-arbitral, that this was not acquiesced in by the parties. On the contrary, we have pleadings dated in the year 1758, from which it appears clearly enough that the parties had come to differ very seriously about one fishing called the Hurle Carle, in consequence of which, as far as we can judge, the proceedings in that submission became abortive. The position taken up by Lady Gray was this—She said that she had condescended to agree to their demand that each party shall possess the fishings opposite to the kavel of lands which belonged to them, but they contend that the fishing called the Hurle Carle, which is opposite to the kavel belonging to Lady Gray, may be adjudged to them. She says she cannot agree to that upon any consideration, and she is of opinion, she says, that considering the concessions that they—meaning herself and her husband—"have made to the Miss Blairs, they should not make any opposition with regard to this fishing of the Hurle Carle; if they should still insist upon its being common, the memorialists must be excused to adhere to their first claim, viz., that the whole fishings be in common, and that each party draw their equal shares of the profits thereof in terms of their rights and infeftments." And the Miss Blairs, on the other hand, expressed a hope that the arbiters would find and declare that not only the other fishings are to continue to be possessed as the separate property belonging to the parties submitters, but also that the Hurle Carle was to be declared a joint property. The evidence regarding this submission there comes to an end, and, as I have said before, I think the natural conclusion is that the whole affair became abortive. But then a period of nearly forty years elapses before we hear any more of these fishings or their owners; and it is very important, if possible, to ascertain what is the state of the matter during that period of forty years. Did they possess these fishings in their character of pro indiviso owners of them, or had they come to any arrangement by which a separate possession had been established, or, without any arrangement, had they acted upon the suggestion contained in the scroll decree-arbitral? Now, we have a great deal of most important light on that question, derived from the submission and decree-arbitral of 1795. No doubt the matter of the fishing is excluded from the division which is intended to be made by that decree-arbitral. The lands are to be divided,—that is to say, the possession by kavels is to be brought to an end, and Inchyra is to be divided into two separate and compact estates. That is what the parties then desired, and they resort to arbiters for the purpose of having this done justly and equally. But they do not give the arbiters power to divide the fishings; but, on the contrary, introduce into their submission a very important reservation concerning these fishings,—"Reserving always to both parties a right of the salmon-fishings in the river Tay respectively belonging to them according to their present boundaries, and which boundaries are not to be affected by any division that may be made in consequence thereof, but that the said arbiters, after such division, shall have power to put in march-stones in the ground belonging to either party to asertain the boundaries of the salmon-fishings belonging to the parties respectively, which are not to be affected by the said division." Now, this is a deed executed by the predecessors of the parties before us—I am speaking now of the two parties who own the lands of Inchyra between them —Lady Gray on the one hand, and Mrs Fleming on the other. Their predecessors declare in this contract that their fishings are marked out by boundaries, and that the fishings defined by these boundaries belong to them in property respectively. And they desire that this division, ascertained by such boundaries, shall stand and remain in all time coming, and shall not be altered or affected by anything to be done by the arbiters in making the division of lands. In short, their agreement is that when the estate of Inchyra is divided into two separate compact estates, each of the proprietors shall not have the fishings ex adverso of his estate for the future, but shall continue to possess the fishings which they had possessed, and which had been defined by boundaries before this submission was entered into. And, accordingly, the arbiters, in disposing of this matter of the fishings, act entirely in the spirit of this reservation, and give it full effect. But the manner in which they do give effect to it throws a great light upon what was the meaning of the parties in making the reservation, because they find that the lowest or eastmost fishing belongs to Lady Gray, and is altogether opposite to the lands of Pitfour, being bounded to the west by the old march-stone "between the lands of Pitfour and Inchyra which we ordered to be marked No. 1;" and then they declare that the several fishings between the different stones that they have laid down belong alternately to the one party and the other, with the exception of one, and that is the Hurle Carle, which is the joint property of Lord Gray and Mr Anderson, Mr Anderson being then the owner of the other half of Inchyra. "And in terms of said submission (they go on) we do hereby declare that the said fishings respectively belonging to each of the said parties shall not be hurt or affected by the division now made of the lands, but that the said fishings shall be enjoyed and possessed according to rights, customs, and usages heretofore observed by the said parties, their authors and predecessors." Now, there cannot be the slightest doubt in point of law that these joint owners of the fishings of Inchyra were quite entitled to divide them if they chose to do so. Nobody can dispute that. What right one of them might have by a process of law to force a division of the fishings is another affair; but that they could by agreement divide these fishings I do not entertain the smallest doubt, and it is impossible, I think, to read this probative instrument—the submission to arbiters in 1794—without coming to the conclusion that although they do not by that deed make a division, they declare in so many words that such a division has been made, and that in virtue of that division the fishings of Inchyra are held and possessed by them, not pro indiviso, but, on the contrary, in a divided form, with the single exception of the fishing called the Hurle Carle. Now, in a question between the pursuer, and the defender Mrs Fleming, it appears to me that after that decree-arbitral, and more particularly after the lapse of nearly eighty years since that decree-arbitral was pronounced without any alteration being made on the boundaries, or anything being done to undo what was then declared to be the state of possession and the rights of the parties, Mrs Fleming is altogether precluded from maintaining that Lady Gray is not entitled to the sole and exclusive property and possession of the lowest fishing, which is altogether opposite to the lands of Pitfour. But then these proceedings are no doubt not directly binding on Sir John Richardson, and it is necessary to ascertain whether he is not entitled to maintain that Lady Gray cannot pursue this action as against him, because she had no title to sue a declarator of sole and exclusive right. I observe, however, that Sir John Richardson has not pleaded this as an objection to Lady Gray's title to sue, and, indeed, I do not think that he has pleaded any good objection to her title at all. His objections to her title are entirely different, and it might perhaps be enough for the present judgment to say that, there being no challenge of this title of Lady Gray upon either of these views of it, Sir John Richardson has no defence against the declarator unless he can make out some right in himself, and that defence I have already disposed of. But I am not desirous to rest my opinion upon any mere technicality in the way of pleading, because I think there is another very good ground upon which Lady Gray is entitled, in respect of this matter, to prevail against Sir John Richardson. Supposing there are two pro indiviso proprietors of a certain subject, it is very true that the one cannot sue a declarator of right without the other; but supposing that one of them insists that he is not a pro indiviso proprietor, but that in respect of transactions with the other co-proprietor he has become a separate and independent proprietor of a particular part of the subject, what is he to do then? He must of course sue the other proprietor to have that established, if it be disputed, and I have said that having sued Mrs Fleming to that effect, I think Lady Gray has proved her case, and is entitled to prevail against Mrs Fleming, and having prevailed against Mrs Fleming, and having established in a question with her that she (Lady

No. 162.

July 14, 1876.
Baroness Gray v. Richardson and Others.

No. 162.

July 14, 1876.
Baroness Gray v. Richardson and Others.

No. 162

July 14, 1876. Baroness Gray v. Richardson and Others.

No. 162.

July 14, 1876.
Baroness Gray v. Richardson and Others.

Gray) is the exclusive proprietor of this portion of the Inchyra fishings by virtue of her title, she is then in a position to go against any stranger in the character of sole and exclusive proprietor, and to maintain her possession and her right against those strangers just as effectually as she did against her co-proprietor. The only person having an interest to maintain that her right is pro indiviso merely having been put to silence, I apprehend that nobody else can come forward to maintain that such is the state of the title. Now, the only peculiarity here is that the stranger, if I may so call Sir John Richardson, or neighbour, is convened in the same action with the co-proprietor as a defender, but I do not think that introduces any difficulty. I think it comes exactly to the same thing as if Lady Gray had first brought her action against Mrs Fleming to put her to silence, and establish, as against her, that she (Lady Gray) is entitled to deal with these fishings as her exclusive property, and then, having finished that process, had brought a declarator against Sir John, because the question which she has got to try with Sir John is an entirely separate and distinct question from that which she had to try with her co-proprietor. The question which she has got to try with Sir John is whether he has any title to the fishing ex adverso of this portion of the Pow Meadow; and in regard to the merits of that question I think she is entitled to prevail, for the reasons that I have already very shortly given. Upon the whole matter, therefore, I am very clearly of opinion, with your Lordships, on the grounds that I have now stated, that Lady Gray is entitled to prevail to the extent which I have indicated. What precise form of words may be adopted for the purpose of expressing the limits of her right to the fishing I am not prepared at this moment to suggest, but probably that may not be very difficult to adjust with the help of the counsel for the parties.

THE COURT, on 11th January 1876, pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lords having heard counsel on the reclaiming note for the Right Honourable Margaret Baroness Gray against the interlocutor of the late Lord Mackenzie, dated 5th January 1875, Recall the said interlocutor: Find and declare that the pursuer has the sole and exclusive right of salmon-fishing in the river Tay ex adverso of that piece of ground formerly called the Meadowpows or Powlands of Inchyra, which lies to the westward of the stone indicated by the letter C on the plan No. 79 of process: To this extent and effect repel the defences, and decern: Find that neither of the defenders have any right of salmon-fishings ex adverso of the said piece of ground: Interdict, prohibit, and discharge the defenders, or either of them, from fishing in the river Tay ex adverso of the said piece of ground, and decern: Quoad ultra assoilzie Sir John Richardson from the conclusions of the summons, and decern: Find the pursuer entitled to expenses against the defenders Mrs Fleming and her husband to the extent of two-thirds of the taxed amount thereof: Find the pursuer entitled to expenses against the defender Sir John Richardson to the extent of one-half of the taxed amount thereof: Allow an account or accounts of the said expenses to be lodged, and remit the same to the Auditor to tax and report."

On considering the report of the Auditor,—

THE COURT, on 14th July 1876, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Approve of the Auditor's report on the pursuer's account of expenses, No. 162 of process, and decern against the defender Sir

No. 162.
July 14, 1876.
Baroness Gray v. Richardson and Others.

John Stewart Richardson for payment to the pursuer of £137, 9s. 0¼d., being the modified amount of the whole taxed expenses, so far as payable by him, and against the defenders Mrs Fleming and her husband for payment to the pursuer of £274, 3s. 3¾d., being the modified amount of the said whole taxed expenses, so far as payable by the said Mrs Fleming and her husband."

HOPE, MACKAY, & MANN, W.S.—MURRAY, BEITH, & MURRAY, W.S.—HAMILTON, KINNEAR, & BEATSON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 163.
July 14, 1876.
Scottish Widows' Fund v. Buist, &c.

THE SCOTTISH WIDOWS' FUND AND LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY, Pursuers.—D.-F. Watson—Asher.
ROBERT BUIST AND OTHERS, Defenders.—Fraser—Scott.

Insurance—Warranty—False statement—Assignation—Assignatus utitur jure auctoris.—A policy of life assurance contained a stipulation that in case it should afterwards appear "that any untrue averment was contained in the declaration by the assured as to his age or state of health, the policy should be void." Held that false statements by the assured in the declaration were a relevant ground of reduction of the policy in the hands of an onerous assignee.

Process—Jury Trial—Proof.—In an action brought by an insurance company to reduce a policy of life assurance on the ground of false statements by the insured, held that it was expedient that the case should be tried by a Lord Ordinary without a jury.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Young. B.

ON 16th August 1871 the Scottish Widows' Fund and Life Assurance Society granted a policy on the life of George Moir for the sum of £1000. This policy contained the following provision:—"In case the assured shall depart beyond the limits of Europe, or die upon the high seas, or shall enter into or engage in any military service except in Great Britain, or naval service whatsoever, or shall come by his death by suicide; or in case it shall hereafter appear that any untrue averment is contained in the declaration before recited as to the age, state of health, or description of the assured; or in case payment of the said contributions shall not be regularly made as aforesaid, then, and in every such case, this certificate shall be void."

The proposal signed by Mr Moir bore,—"That if any untrue averment is contained in the above declaration, or if the answers given to any of the above queries shall be inconsistent with the real facts of the case, all claim to any benefit out of or interest in the funds of the said society in virtue of any certificate or policy that may be issued or delivered in relation hereto shall be barred and excluded; and all payments that may have been made in consequence thereof shall belong to the society."

On 21st March 1872 Mr Moir assigned the policy to Robert Buist, Hugh Mitchell, and James M'Caul, and the assignation was duly intimated to the insurance company.

On 28th June 1875 Mr Moir died, and the defenders applied to the insurance company for payment of the sum in the policy.

The insurance company subsequently raised the present action of reduction. They averred that Mr Moir had died at the age of thirty, the cause of death being stated to be "otorrhæa, disease of the internal ear, suppurative arachnitis;" that the pursuers had discovered, and that it was the fact, that the statements made by Mr Moir in his proposal and declaration were in several material respects untrue; that Mr Moir knew that they were so at the time he made the statements; that Mr Moir had represented himself to be a man of temperate habits, and one who had never suffered from any but slight and childish complaints, while in point of fact he was addicted to drink, and had suffered severely from

No. 163.
July 14, 1876.
Scottish Widows' Fund v. Buist, &c.

suppuration and other serious diseases; that the said diseases were among those which tend to shorten life; and their tendency in this direction was greatly aggravated by habits of dissipation such as those in which Mr Moir indulged, and which ultimately caused his death.

The pursuers also averred fraudulent misrepresentation on the part of the insured.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The statements and answers made by Mr Moir as aforesaid having been untrue the said policy and the assurance bearing to be thereby effected are void in terms of the stipulations to that effect, and the same ought to be reduced, with all that has followed thereon. (2) At all events, Mr Moir having, in making the said statements and answers, made misrepresentations and concealed facts and circumstances material to the said contract of assurance, and, separatim, having done so fraudulently, and having thereby induced the pursuers to enter into the same, the said policy, and all that has followed thereon, is reducible, and ought to be reduced. (4) The defenders, as assignees of the policy, have no higher or other right than the assured himself had.

The defenders denied any misrepresentation on the part of Mr Moir. They also averred that Mr Moir had referred the pursuers for information to a medical man, and that the pursuers had never gone to him for information.

They pleaded, inter alia;—(1) Any mis-statement or omission on the part of the assured, even if made, although it might have furnished a good objection against him, cannot affect the policy in the hands of onerous assignees. (3) Especially, it not being averred that the alleged omissions or mis-statements had any reference to the disease of which the assured died, there is no relevant statement as against onerous assignees. (4) Assuming the inaccuracy of statements of the assured, the pursuers might have ascertained this with ordinary diligence before the intimation of the defenders' assignation, and, separatim, having obtained from the assured the means of ascertaining it, and not having done so, they are barred from objecting to the claims of the defenders, whose assignation they accepted, and from whom they received the premiums. (5) The assured having given a reference to a medical man, from whom information might have been received, and the pursuers not having availed themselves of said reference, they cannot now object to the policy in the hands of onerous assignees. (8) The statements made by the pursuers are not relevant even against the assured, much less against onerous assignees, and the summons should be dismissed, with expenses. (10) In the circumstances condescended on, the pursuers are barred from disputing the claim.

The Lord Ordinary, in respect that the defenders did not insist in their prejudicial pleas as an objection to leading proof, allowed the parties a proof of their averments.

The defenders reclaimed, and moved the Court to direct the Lord Ordinary to appoint issues to be given in.

The Court desired to hear the parties on the prejudicial pleas 1, 3, 5, 8.

At the suggestion of the Court the pursuers amended their first plea as follows:—(1) The truth of the statements and answers made by Mr Moir as aforesaid having been warranted by him, and these statements and answers being untrue, the said policy, and assurance bearing to be thereby effected, are void, in terms of the stipulations to that effect, and the same ought to be reduced, with all that has followed thereon.

Argued for the defenders;—(1) Purchasers of policies of insurance at a public sale could not be prejudiced by the declarations, which were private documents belonging to the insurance company. This was contemplated by the company, who affixed a notice on the back of the declaration that the policy when issued would be an article "of known negotiable value." (2) The pursuers relied on the maxim assignatus utitur jure auctoris. This maxim was really no older in the wide sense now contended for than Erskine. Stair, in treating of the subject, did not use the maxim.[1] In the early law of Scotland, as in England, assignees were merely procurators in rem suam. This might be traced in the style books. Ross gave the old form. Dallas introduced the words "cessionars and assignees;" and, lastly, the word "irrevocable" was added to make the present style.[2] Stair, when he applied the doctrine expressed in the maxim assignatus utitur jure auctoris meant such assignees as were merely procurators in rem suam. But where an obligement was taken to an assignee eo nomine, and where, consequently, an assignee had a locus standi of his own, the maxim did not apply. Erskine introduced the maxim as of general application, but the passage in Stair, on which he relied, was not in the original editions,[3] and Bankton expressly said it was not a universal rule. Lord Kames observed the distinction.[4] Even to the doctrine as laid down by Erskine there were certain exceptions, e.g., the oath of the cedent was not allowed to prejudice the assignee. For purposes of commerce the maxim was not allowed to apply to corporeal moveables or commercial documents. The case of Redfearn[5] extended these exceptions still further, and the same considerations of utility as were present to induce the decision in Redfearn's case were present here. The English decisions were not in point, as it required an Act of Parliament to allow assignees of policies of life assurance to sue in their own name.[6]

No. 163. July 14, 1876. Scottish Widows' Fund v. Buist, &c.

Argued for the pursuers;—This was not an exception to the general rule assignatus utitur jure auctoris.[7] There were only three cases to which that rule did not apply,—(1) heritable property; (2) corporeal moveables; (3) commercial documents.[8] Redfearn's case did not apply. In it the question was between an assignee and a person claiming in right of the cedent. The condition here was not latent, but patent, and formed a part of the contract. The defenders were aware of the risk when they acquired the policy, and were in the position of one taking a bill with an indorsation "without recourse" upon it. The word "assignee" was introduced into deeds to put the debtor in bad faith if he paid to the cedent after intimation. The application of the principle here contended for by the defenders would put an end to compensation. Both Stair and Bankton treated an assignee not as a mere procurator, but as one having a completed right.[9] It had been decided in England that an onerous assignee was in no better position than the original holder.[10] In Scotland the contrary had not been thought worth pleading.

---

[1] See Brodie's Stair, i. 10, 16, note; iii. 1, 23; iv. 40, 21; Appendix, p. 788 More, or 834 Brodie.

[2] Ross' Lect. i. 191-192; Dallas, 4th ed., vol. i. p. 2; Jurid. Styles, 3d ed., vol. ii. 667.

[3] Ersk. iii. 5, 10; Brodie's Stair, i. 10, 16, p. 120, note; Bankton, ii. 191-8.

[4] Kames' Elucidat., art. 2, ad fin.

[5] Redfearn v. Somervail, June 1, 1813, 1 Dow, 50, 5 Pat. 707.

[6] 30 and 31 Vict. c. 144.

[7] Pandects, De Reg. Juris., l. 172.

[8] Ersk. iii. 5, 10; Stair, iv. 40, 21; Bell's Com. i. 284, 5th ed.; Bell's Pr. 1468.

[9] Schaw, Dec. 19, 1622, M. 829; Muir, Dec. 8, 1635, M. 831.

[10] British Equitable Insurance Co. v. Great Western Railway Co., Nov. 10, 1868, 38 L. J. Chancery, 133; Scottish Amicable Society v. Fuller, 16 Weekly Reporter, 274; Forbes v. Edinburgh Life Assurance Co., March 9, 1832, 10 S. 451, 4 Scot. Jur. 385; Menzies on Conveyancing, 3d ed. 264; White v. British Empire Life Assurance Co., Nov. 5, 1868, 7 L. R., Eq. 394; Borrodaile, March 9, 1847, 10 Beav. 335; Philips on Insurance, i., 61; Bunyan on Insurance, 219.

At advising,— No. 163.

July 14, 1876.
Scottish Widows' Fund v. Buist, &c.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This case was brought before us upon a reclaiming note, the object of which, as we understood it, was to determine in what manner this case ought to be tried—whether in the ordinary way by a jury, or before the Lord Ordinary and without a jury. But upon looking into the record with a view to determine that question, it appeared to the Court that there were several pleas stated for the defenders Buist and Mitchell which ought to be cleared away and disposed of before the consideration as to the mode of trial should be taken at all. Those pleas are the 1st, 3d, 5th, and 8th. As regards the 3d plea, that has been abandoned by the defenders in the course of the discussion, because they think that a certain addition which has been made to the averments of the pursuers removes the ground of that plea. The 8th, which is a general plea of irrelevancy as against the case of the pursuers stated on record, is, I think, not seriously insisted in; at all events it may be disposed of in a single word, because this is an action for reduction of a policy upon the ground, in the first place, that there has been a breach of warranty, and, in the second place, upon the ground of fraud as regards the representations made by the assured concerning his own health and habits, and it would be very difficult indeed to understand how, if anything like distinct averments are made upon that subject, they could be open to the objection of irrelevancy. The only matters, therefore, which really require consideration now are the 1st and 5th pleas, and these two, I think, must be considered separately.

The first plea is as follows:—"Any mis-statement or omission on the part of the assured, even if made, although it might have furnished a good objection against him, cannot affect the policy in the hands of onerous assignees." Now, that raises a very general question, but one that, in my opinion, is not attended with any difficulty. The contract which is contained in a policy of insurance is a mutual contract, by which the insurance company or insurance society on the one hand come under an obligation to pay a certain sum of money upon the death of the assured, and the assured, on the other hand, becomes bound to pay certain sums, either annually or otherwise, in the name of premium; and these obligations are counterparts of one another. But this particular policy of insurance, like most other policies of insurance, at least in modern times, contained certain conditions, the non-fulfilment of which is declared to be visited with the absolute invalidity of the contract. The provision is this,—"In case the assured shall depart beyond the limits of Europe, or die upon the high seas, or shall enter into or engage in any military service except in Great Britain, or naval service whatsoever, or shall come by his death by suicide; or in case it shall hereafter appear that any untrue averment is contained in the declaration before recited as to the age, state of health, or description of the assured; or in case payment of the said contributions shall not be regularly made as aforesaid, then, and in every such case, this certificate shall be void." Now, the first ground of action in this case depends upon the view of this condition (that any untrue averment contained in the declaration shall void the policy) being a warranty upon the part of the assured, and it is pleaded that the declaration contained several very important false statements, and upon that ground the policy is, under the special provision of the contract, necessarily void. But the action is also laid upon a separate ground, and that is the ground of fraud. It is averred that the assured, in making his proposal for the policy, and carrying through the transaction with

No. 163.

July 14, 1876.
Scottish Widows' Fund v. Buist, &c.

this insurance society, made fraudulent representations in regard to his health and habits. Now, there is this distinction between these two grounds of action, that one of them is founded upon a clause in the contract and the other is not. The plea of the defenders is that neither of these grounds of action is available against an onerous assignee of this policy. It appears to me to be long ago settled in the law of Scotland—and I have never heard of any attempt to disturb the doctrine—that in a personal obligation, whether contained in a unilateral deed or in a mutual contract, if the creditor's right is sold to an assignee for value, and the assignee purchases in good faith, he is nevertheless subject to all the exceptions and pleas pleadable against the original creditor. That is the doctrine laid down in all our institutional writers, and it has been affirmed in many cases. But it seems to be said that this doctrine admits of some exceptions. Now, that I entirely dispute. I think the true view of the law is that these things that are called exceptions are classes of cases to which the doctrine does not apply. The doctrine does not apply to the transmission of heritable estate; the doctrine does not apply in the sale of corporeal moveables. But within the class of cases to which the doctrine is applicable—I mean the transmission to assignees of a creditor's right in a personal obligation—I know of no exception to the application of the doctrine. It is the merest mistake to suppose that the case of Redfearn introduced any exception to that doctrine, because the doctrine is this—that in a question between the debtor in a personal obligation and the assignee of the creditor, the assignee is open to all the objections that would have been pleadable against the cedent. Now, what is the case of Redfearn? It is not a case between the assignee and the original debtor at all, and therefore in the case of Redfearn the doctrine had no application. We find the ground of judgment in the House of Lords in both the reports we have of the case, viz. in Dow's report, and in that contained in Paton's more recent publication. Lord Redesdale, in stating his objections to the judgment of the Court below, cited the authorities in the law of Scotland for the purpose of shewing to what case the doctrine I am now speaking of was applicable. For example, he cited this passage in Stair,[1]—"The common rule of law is more rational, that the assignee utitur jure auctoris, and is in no better case than the cedent unless it be in the matter of probation, that the cedent's oath will not prove against him nisi in jure litigioso, and therefore in personalibus all exceptions against the cedent are competent against the assignee, even compensation itself;" and after citing other authorities his Lordship proceeded in the following terms:—"It was manifest that all this applied to the exceptions or counter claims which the original debtor might have against his creditor, and not to another title set up by a third party in competition with the claim of an assignee, which is the case here." So that the case then before the House of Lords was the case of a question between the assignee and a third party altogether, and to such a case the House of Lords determined that the doctrine did not apply, and that the Court here had been wrong in so applying it. But the doctrine itself, so far from being questioned by the noble and learned Lords who decided the case, is set up and commended. The Lord Chancellor in like manner says,—"If the glass company was the debtor, the question here was not between the assignee and the debtor but between the assignee and a person setting up a collateral claim under an alleged equity;" and further on,—"The question was not between the debtor of Stewart and his assignee, but between the assignee and one possessing a secret equity. This disposes at once of the argument respecting an assignment by an executor."

[1] Brodie's Stair (i. 10, 16), p. 120, note.

I hold it therefore to be clearly established that in all cases of personal obligation, whether constituted by unilateral deeds or mutual contract, this doctrine is universally applicable; and it appears to me that that is a conclusive answer to this first plea in law.

With regard to the only remaining plea to which it is necessary to advert, I confess I do sympathise a good deal with the difficulty which has been expressed in understanding what it precisely means. It is as follows:—"(5) The assured having given a reference to a medical man, from whom information might have been received, and the pursuers not having availed themselves of said reference, they cannot now object to the policy in the hands of onerous assignees." Assuming, as I now do, that the onerous assignee is liable to all the objections pleadable against his cedent, I must take this to mean that if the assured gives a reference to a medical man, and the insurance company or society do not go to that medical man and take the information which he has to give them, they cannot afterwards reduce the policy, as in a question with the assured, either upon breach of warranty or upon the assured's fraud. Now, that to my mind is a very startling contention. I do not see upon what view of justice it is founded. A reference to a medical man may be asked and taken by the insurance company, but it is asked and taken by them only for their own benefit, not for the benefit of the assured, and if they choose to depend upon the warranty of the assured instead of resorting to the medical man or to any other source of information, they are quite entitled to do so. I cannot imagine that under any circumstances a plea of that kind could be maintained. But more particularly is this plea untenable when viewed in reference to the facts stated upon record, and practically admitted by the pursuers, that Dr Watson, the medical man in question, was referred to only as a person who had attended the assured two years previously for a violent cold and an eruptive complaint. I do not understand it to be questioned that it was the truth that Dr Watson had attended the assured for such a complaint, and if it was true the company could have got no more from Dr Watson than we have now, viz., that he had attended the assured for such a complaint. Would that have prevented them or would the non-possession of that knowledge now prevent them from challenging this policy either on the ground of breach of warranty or on the ground of fraud? I must say I fail altogether to understand the principle upon which this plea is founded, and I am therefore compelled to say I think it utterly untenable as a defence against this action.

LORD DEAS.—This question arises upon a mutual contract. The contract was that the insurance office upon the death of Moir should pay a certain sum to him, his heirs, executors, or assignees. But it was made an express condition of that contract, inter alia, that in case "it should hereafter appear that any untrue averment is contained in the declaration before recited as to the age, state of health, or description of the said George Moir, this certificate shall be void, and all claim to any benefit out of or interest in the funds of said society in virtue of these presents shall cease and determine." Now, the assignee who purchased Moir's right under this contract, of course, saw beforehand that such were the terms of the contract. But then it is said that though these were the words of the contract there were various other writings, and, in particular, a declaration there referred to, necessary to be seen before the whole import and effect of the contract could be understood. It is said on behalf of the assignee that he had no means or opportunity of seeing those other writings. The answer to that, I think, is that there was nothing to have prevented him from seeing all those writings if he got the authority of the party assured to do so, and communicated that authority to the insurance company. I think the observation that the insurance company were not entitled, far less bound, to reveal things of that kind to whoever chose to apply is quite sound; but then the reply to that is, that upon production of authority from the party assured the office were not only entitled but bound to allow the documents to be seen. Well, then, this is a contract, the whole of which either was or might have been before the party obtaining the assignation. It is not, therefore, a case in which there is any latent equity, or any latent condition, or anything latent at all. The party taking the assignation was entitled to see everything, and if he did not do so that was entirely his own fault. Now, as applicable to a case of that kind, I have no doubt at all that the plea of an onerous assignee, that he is not bound by the undertakings or by the fraud of the party from whom he purchased, cannot be supported. There was a good deal of force in many of the observations Mr Fraser made with reference to the history of our law and the authority of our institutional writers upon this matter of assignee and cedent, that down to a comparatively recent period the assignee was merely procurator for or mandatary of the cedent, and, consequently, the obligations pleadable against the cedent were necessarily pleadable against the assignee, so that as regards writers of that period, speaking of the law in its then state, we ought to be cautious in deducing the doctrine that the assignee is in no better situation than his cedent. I am not prepared to affirm that doctrine in the abstract, and it is not the least necessary to this case to do so. There may be exceptions to that doctrine in cases of what are called latent equities, not open to be ascertained by the assignee, and yet open or known to the cedent. Be that as it may, however, there is here no latent equity,—nothing which was not equally open to the assignee as it was to the cedent. In that state of matters I cannot help thinking that the assignee is clearly in no better position than the cedent. It may be very true, as Mr Fraser said, that this may put a restraint upon the use of life policies as a fund of credit upon which to go into the market and raise money. There is great force in that as producing a certain amount of inconvenience, but I am afraid far greater inconvenience and far greater injustice would arise if it were to be held that as soon as a party, however fraudulently and however falsely, has obtained a policy upon his life, he may go into the market and sell it—it may be to a friend or a relation who knows a great deal, as well as the party himself, though that knowledge cannot be brought home to him, and then the insurance office must be liable for the whole sum insured. I think that is more startling upon the one side than any of the inconveniences Mr Fraser urges upon the other. There may be some hardship in these inconveniences, but the party who takes an assignation to a contract must take it as it is; and if he has the means of ascertaining everything about it, and does not do so, I am of opinion that whatever may be said of other and different cases, the assignee is, in that case, in no better position that the cedent.

No. 163.

July 14, 1876.
Scottish Widows' Fund v. Buist, &c.

As regards the other plea or pleas, they seem to be directed entirely against the relevancy of the action. The argument seems to be, that because the insurance office did not apply to Dr Watson for something he could have told them, therefore all the rest of the allegations in this record must be held to be irrelevant. It can only be put in that way at this stage of the case. I cannot listen to that for a moment. I do not think that any of the objections here, which resolve themselves into objections to relevancy, are well founded, and therefore, both upon the first plea and upon the case generally, I concur in the result arrived at by your Lordship.

LORD MURE.—I agree in the result at which your Lordships have arrived. I do not think it necessary for the decision of the case to enter at any length upon the question as to the precise extent to which the doctrine assignatus utitur jure auctoris can be carried; but I am satisfied that your Lordship in the chair has given a correct exposition of the bearing of the case of Redfearn upon that doctrine, and that the general rule, as laid down in the passage quoted from Lord Stair and Mr Erskine, has not been set aside by the decision in that case, because that decision appears to me to have proceeded expressly upon the ground that the claim which was there ultimately rejected was made in respect of certain latent equities which had not been notified to the party holding the right assigned. But in the present case there is no question of latent equity raised. On the face of the policy, which is the defenders' title, the right is declared to be defeasible in certain specified events; and when the assignee took that policy from the cedent he took it with that declaration upon the face of it, and knew that if a breach of warranty or fraud could be substantiated the policy was void. That is on the face of the parties' own title; and on that ground alone I am of opinion that the first plea in law should be repelled. Upon the fifth plea I agree with the observations made by your Lordship in the chair.

LORD ARDMILLAN was absent.

On the question as to whether there should be a proof before the Lord Ordinary or a jury trial the defenders argued;—The case is peculiarly suitable for trial by jury. It is not like the case of Foster, where there was only one fact in dispute.[1] Here there are many facts, involving an inquiry into habits of intemperance, defraud, and conspiracy.

The pursuers argued;—There are intricate questions of law as regards warranty and construction of contract, and the case will fall to be tried along with two similar cases regarding policies effected by the deceased upon his life with two other insurance offices now depending before the Lord Ordinary. The case was therefore not suitable for a jury.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I have looked very carefully into these cases for the purpose of determining in what way it is most expedient that they should be tried, and I have come to the conclusion that they ought to be tried before the Lord Ordinary without a jury. My reason is very much this, that I anticipate there will necessarily arise at the trial some important legal principles which must be applied to the evidence, and some of which would perhaps be difficult for a jury to follow, and with regard to some of which there might even be a natural prejudice in the minds of the jury. It is for these reasons that I think these cases are suited to be tried in the mode I have suggested.

We had occasion to see an example, not very long ago, of the effect of trying a question of this kind without a jury, and the result was to my mind very satisfactory,—I mean the case of Foster v. The Life Association of Scotland. That [1] Life Association v. Foster, Jan. 31, 1873, 11 Macph. 351, 45 Scot. Jur. 240.

No. 163.
July 14, 1876.
Scottish Widows' Fund v. Buist, &c.

was a very delicate case, as the present may turn out to be for anything we can now see, and it turned very much upon the question whether, in point of fact, in the negotiations between the parties, the insured had knowingly undertaken a warranty. Whether that question will arise here I cannot tell. But for all I can now see it may occur, and that is a question which I think had better be determined by a Judge and not by a jury.

LORD DEAS.—I am of the same opinion, and on the same grounds. An additional reason occurs to me for not going to a jury, that there are really three cases here, some points in which may be identical and some not. It would be both inconvenient and expensive to have three jury trials, and if the cases were all tried together the trial would be a very complicated one. That inconvenience is entirely obviated by the course your Lordship has suggested.

LORD MURE.—Had this been a pure question of alleged fraudulent representation on the part of the assured that might have been a reason for sending the case to a jury. But that is not the only question raised; and, in the whole circumstances, I concur in thinking that the case is better fitted for the determination of a Judge than for trial before a jury.

LORD ARDMILLAN was absent.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the interlocutor, except in so far as it finds the defenders liable in expenses; and having heard counsel on the first, third, fifth, eighth, and tenth pleas for the defenders, repel the said pleas, and decern: Remit to the Lord Ordinary of new to allow the parties a proof of their averments, and to proceed further in the case as shall be just, reserving all questions of expenses.

GIBSON-CRAIG, DALZIEL, & BRODIES, W.S.—JAMES M'CAUL, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 164.
July 15, 1876.
Batchelor v. Pattison, and Mackersey's Executor.

ALEXANDER BATCHELOR, Appellant.
GEORGE HANDASYDE PATTISON, AND MACKERSEY'S EXECUTOR,—Respondents.—D.-F. Watson—Black.

Expenses—Fees to Counsel.—Circumstances in which held that the Auditor might allow fees to counsel to be charged as between party and party though they had not been sent to counsel until after the judgment had been given.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Midlothian.
M.

SEE ante, p. 914.

In this case the appellant objected to the Auditor's report, in so far as he had allowed charges for fees to the respondents' counsel which had not been sent at the time when instructions were sent to counsel, they having, in the circumstances, declined to accept fees with their instructions.

The respondents stated that the practice was well known, and, in cases like the present, quite reasonable, and referred to Tough's Trustees v. Dumbarton Water Commissioners, ante, vol. i., p. 879.

LORD PRESIDENT.—What the Auditor proposes to do in this case, viz., to allow reasonable fees although they were not actually paid at the time, is consistent with a practice of long standing—a practice with which I was quite familiar while at the bar, and of which your Lordships are quite aware. The practice is reasonable in itself, and is not inconsistent with the provisions of the Act of Sederunt.[1] The principle is that counsel and agents may feel that the circumstances of a case are such that the agent cannot consent to make charges or the counsel to receive fees from their client, but they cannot have the same feeling to their client's opponent, and when he is found liable this feeling will therefore disappear. Accordingly, it is quite reasonable that when the client's opponent has to pay such a charge should be allowed by the Auditor.

[1] Act of Sederunt, Dec. 19, 1835.

No. 164.
July 15, 1876.
Batchelor v. Pattison, and Mackersey's Executor.

LORD DEAS and LORD MURE concurred.

LORD ARDMILLAN was absent.

THE COURT approved of the Auditor's report.

WILLIAM SAUNDERS, S.S.C.—Agent.

THE UNIVERSITY OF ABERDEEN AND OTHERS, Pursuers.—Asher—Jameson. THE MAGISTRATES AND TOWN-COUNCIL OF ABERDEEN, Defenders.—D.-F. Watson—Keir.

No. 165.
July 18, 1876.
University of Aberdeen v. Magistrates of Aberdeen.

Property—Trust—Prescription—Mortification—Act 1696, c. 25.—By deed of mortification the granter assigned certain sums to the town-council of a burgh to be invested and the proceeds applied towards the maintenance of a professor in a university. The funds were invested in land, which were managed for many years by the master of mortifications, an officer of the corporation, in whose name the title was taken. Afterwards the town-council appointed a portion of the lands, including a strip of land on the sea-coast, to be exposed for sale by public roup. The subjects were sold for payment of a feu-duty, and to a person who afterwards declared that he had purchased on behalf of the treasurer of the town, and the latter was infeft upon charter in his favour for behoof of the magistrates, council, and community. Soon afterwards the town-council, upon a representation that they were proprietors of the ground, obtained from the Crown a grant of the salmon-fishings ex adverso of the strip of land.

In an action of declarator brought more than forty years afterwards by the university, with concurrence of two professors interested in the mortification, held (1) that the town-council still held the lands in trust for the mortification, and that they could plead no prescriptive right against the trust; (2) (rev. judgment of Lord Young) that, having acquired the fishings in the character of proprietors of the trust-property, they were bound to communicate the benefit to the trust, and hold them for behoof the trust; (3) (rev. judgment of Lord Young) that the consent and concurrence of the two professors gave the university a sufficient title and interest to sue for arrears.

Observations (per Lord Deas) on Trust Act 1696, c. 25.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Young. M.

THE following narrative of the facts is taken from the opinion of Lord Deas:—"By deed of mortification, dated 9th December 1613, Dr Duncan Liddell assigned and conveyed to the council of New Aberdeen, and Mr Thomas Nicolson, so long as he should be in life, 6000 merks Scots, to be employed on land and other sufficient security, and the annualrent thereof applied, to the extent therein mentioned, in maintaining a professor of mathematics in the college of New Aberdeen,—that is to say, Marischal College,—and out of the surplus revenue to apply twenty merks annually in maintaining the library he had left to the college, twelve merks for poor scholars at the college and grammar school, and eight merks to the common poor of New Aberdeen.

"By three separate deeds of mortification, executed respectively in 1613, 1622, and 1627, Patrick Coupland, a preacher in the Navy of the East India Company, gave, mortified, and destined to 'the provost, bailies, and council of the burgh of Aberdeen, and to their successors, provost, bailies, and council thereof, in all time coming,' 2000 merks Scots each, to be laid out by them on land or annualrent, 'and the yearly annualrent thereof to be given by them towards the maintenance of a learned divine and linguist, skilful in the Hebrew and Greek tongues,' in the college of the burgh—to be chosen by the provost, bailies, and council of the burgh for the time being.

No. 165.
July 18, 1876.
University of Aberdeen v. Magistrates of Aberdeen.

"It is proved by documentary evidence, and admitted in the record, that the sums thus mortified by Dr Liddell and Mr Coupland were accepted and received by the provost, magistrates, and town-council of Aberdeen, or, in other words, by the corporation of the burgh, in trust for the purposes for which they were thus mortified, and placed under the management of one of their number, chosen annually, called the hospital master. In 1704 they invested the amount, along with the funds of four other mortifications under their management, in the purchase of the pro indiviso half of the lands and barony of Torrie, then belonging to Sir William Forbes of Monymusk. The disposition executed by Sir William acknowledged receipt of the price from Alexander Hepburn, the then master of mortifications, out of the funds of the respective mortifications, and disponed the lands to him 'and his successors, master of mortifications of the said burgh of Aberdeen, heritably and irredeemably,' for the use and behoof of the mortifications therein enumerated, including those of Liddell and Coupland now in question. I understand it to be admitted that on this disposition infeftment followed in favour of the master of mortifications, and that when the lands and barony were afterwards divided in 1785, under a submission between the master of mortifications and the proprietor of the other pro indiviso half, the title of the master of mortifications to the one-half was completed in the same terms on which he had held the pro indiviso half,—that is to say, expressly as held by him in his official capacity in trust for the purposes of the several mortifications,—the free rents being apportioned amongst them according to a scheme arranged with that view,—the professor of divinity receiving the proportion of the income derived from Coupland's mortification, and the professor of mathematics his share of the income derived from Liddell's mortification, and the balance being appropriated to the other purposes specified in Coupland's deed.

"Prior to 1796 the master of mortifications had, by authority of the provost, magistrates, and council, feued out various portions of the eastern half allotted to them in the division of the lands and barony of Torrie to different parties for payment of certain specified feu-duties. These feu-rights were granted in favour of third parties, and the feu-duties were made applicable and applied to their proper purposes. Consequently these feu-rights were quite within the power of the administrators of the mortifications, and are not sought to be challenged in this action, which relates solely to what came to be called the reserved portion of the divided half of the lands and barony of Torrie, so far as the university, which now comprehends what was formerly the College of Aberdeen, and the professors of divinity and mathematics are interested therein.

"But in the year 1797 a transaction of a different description took place. By the feu-charter, dated 14th September of that year, James Dick, designing himself master of mortifications of the burgh of Aberdeen, in consideration of a feu-duty of £50 a-year agreed to be paid to him in that capacity, and to his successors in office, by Gavin Hadden, treasurer of the burgh, and his successors in the office of treasurer, for behoof of the burgh sold, alienated, and in feu-farm disponed to and in favour of the said Gavin Hadden and his successors in office, 'treasurers of the said burgh, and their assignees, for the use and behoof of the provost, bailies, council, and commnnity of the said burgh, and their successors, heritably and irredeemably, without reversion or regress, All and Whole that part of the east division of the said lands and barony of Torrie belonging in property to the said master of mortifications, lying on the south side of the town of Torrie and south pier of the harbour of Aberdeen,' occupied by the tenants therein named; as also 'All and Whole that slip or piece of moor and pasture ground of the said lands and barony of Torrie lying along the Girdleness and Bay of Nigg, interjected betwixt the lands of North Kirkhill and South Kirkhill on the west, as distinguished by the march-stones thereof, and the sea on the east, and betwixt the north-east part of North Kirkhill on the south, and the south pier of Aberdeen on the north,' as the same was then occupied by the tacksman thereof therein named; and in like manner All and Whole these several tenements or houses, yards, crofts, and butts of land therein mentioned, all lying on the east end of the village or fish-town of Torrie, and adjacent to the west end of Torrie pier, viz., the crofts and feu-duties therein enumerated, reserving to the feuars their feu-rights; likewise the said master of mortifications, his share, interest, and concern in the ferry-boat on the south side of the river Dee, belonging to the said lands and barony, as then possessed by Alexander Robertson, 'all which subjects above specified were excepted and reserved by the said master of mortifications when the remainder of his division of the said lands and barony were sold and feued out by public roup upon the 17th of June 1786.' Upon the precept of sasine contained in this deed, sasine was given to Gavin Hadden, treasurer of the burgh, for the use and behoof of the provost, bailies, council, and community of the burgh, on 20th April 1797, and the instrument of sasine was duly recorded on the 26th of the same month and year. This feu-charter and sasine, which shew upon the face of them how the burgh acquired the subjects, form the only feudal title thereto in favour of the burgh at the present day."

No. 165.

July 18, 1876.
University of Aberdeen v. Magistrates of Aberdeen.

In 1801 the town-council applied by petition to the Lords of the Treasury, setting forth that they were infeft in the said lands, and craving a grant of the salmon-fishings in the sea opposite the slip of moor and pasture ground lying along the Girdleness and Bay of Nigg, the rent of which was 5s. per annum, This petition was referred to the Barons of Exchequer,* and a crown-charter of the salmon-fishings opposite a considerable part of the lands was granted in 1804 in favour of the town-council, as proprietors infeft in the lands. No consideration was granted to the Crown therefor.

The charter, upon which infeftment followed, bore to be granted—"Propter favorem quem habemus erga praedilectos nostros prepositum, balivos, thesaurarium, concilium et communitatem civitatis de Aberdeen."

From that time forward the town-council paid a feu-duty of £50 for the purposes of the mortifications, and themselves drew the rents of the strip of ground and salmon-fishings, which greatly increased in value since 1796.

After the universities and colleges of Aberdeen were united by Act of Parliament in 1858 it was enacted by ordinance of the university commissioners that Liddell's mortification should be attached to the faculty

* The petition stated, inter alia, "that a right of salmon-fishing is inter regalia, and belongs to the Crown, but where no private right has been formerly granted or established it has been the practice of the Crown graciously to grant such right to the heritors of the adjacent lands, which occasions the trouble of this application to your Lordships," and in a memorial to the Barons of Exchequer, the magistrates stated that in 1786 the slip of ground along the coast was reserved when the rest was feued, "principally with a view of enabling the town-council to purchase the same when necessary, to extend and increase the improvements of the harbour, which they were then, and at present are, carrying on at a very considerable expense, as well as with the express view of obtaining a grant of salmon-fishing opposite to those reserved lands."

No. 165. of arts, and that Coupland's should be attached to the professorship of divinity and church history.

July 18, 1876. University of Aberdeen v. Magistrates of Aberdeen.

This action was raised against the magistrates and town-council of Aberdeen, as representing the community of the city, by the university, with consent and concurrence of Dr John Cruickshank, sometime professor of mathematics, and Rev. W. R. Pirie, professor of divinity and church history. It concluded for declarator that the reserved strip of ground, the share of the ferry-boat, and the right of salmon-fishing, were, to the extent of twenty-one twenty-second parts of twenty-seven one-hundredth parts, and to the further extent of twelve one-hundredth parts, held by the defenders, as trustees for behoof of the pursuers as beneficiaries under the mortifications of Liddell, Coupland, and Chalmerlaine,* and that the sale in 1797 was null. There were also conclusions for accounting and for reduction of the charter and sasine of 1797.

The pursuers, besides the statements embodied in the foregoing narrative, averred that the price of the ground was grossly inadequate, and that the fishings were very valuable; also that the management of the mortifications having been in the hands of the town-council, the university authorities were not cognisant of the manner in which it had been attempted to defeat the just rights of the beneficiaries.

The defenders averred that the feu-duty was higher than the rent of the ground at the time, though it had subsequently increased in value, and that the rent of the fishings was only £10 for a long time, though now they were let for £605; further, that the university authorities were fully cognisant of the transaction.

The pursuers pleaded;—(2) The lands of Torrie and others, set forth in the summons, having been acquired to the extent foresaid by the funds of said mortifications, and having been thereafter allocated to the extent foresaid for the purposes of the said mortifications, were thereafter held in trust for the purposes foresaid, and could not be lawfully alienated. (3) The said salmon-fishings having been granted by the Crown to the town-council as proprietors of the said lands and others, the same accrued to and now belong to the said mortification to the extent of their interest in the said lands and others. (5) The alleged transaction by which the predecessors of the defenders are said to have acquired said lands and others, and everything which has followed thereon, is null and void, or at least reducible, in respect that the defenders and their predecessors could not lawfully purchase or acquire the subjects which they held in trust for the purposes foresaid. (6) The defenders and their predecessors, having received the profits and revenues of the foresaid subjects, the defenders are bound to count and reckon therefor in terms of the conclusions of the libel.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) No title to sue. (2) Statements not relevant. (3) The defenders having possessed the subjects libelled on charters and sasines in their favour for more than forty years the present action cannot be maintained. (4) The present investments of the mortified funds having been made by the defenders within their powers as trustees the present action is unfounded. (5) In particular, the sale of the reserved portion of Torrie in 1797 was a fair and reasonable change of investment, and cannot now be challenged by the pursuers. (6) The pursuers and their predecessors having been cognisant of the purchase of the subjects libelled, other than the salmon-fishings, in 1797, and of the grant of the fishings in 1804, and having annually accepted the free revenue of the

* Chalmerlaine's mortification was apparently inserted in the summons under a misapprehension.

No. 165.

July 18, 1876.
University of Aberdeen v. Magistrates of Aberdeen.

mortifications and granted receipts therefor to the defenders without objection until 1872, are barred by mora and acquiescence from insisting in the present action. (7) The defenders having obtained a crown-grant of the salmon-fishings libelled in 1804, after due advertisement, and the pursuers never having objected to the said grant, or claimed the rents of the said fishings until 1872, are barred from insisting in the present action as regards the said fishings.

The Lord Ordinary, on 25th November 1874, delivered the undernoted opinion,* and on 25th March 1875 pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds

---

* "OPINION.—The defenders admit the constitution and subsistence in them as trustees of the several trusts created by the deeds of mortification referred to in the first three articles of the condescendence. They dispute, however, that these trusts attach to the lands and fishings specified in the conclusions of the summons, which, according to their contention, were held by them not as trustees under the mortifications, but as representing and for behoof of the community of the burgh of Aberdeen.

"It being admitted that the funds of the mortifications referred to in articles 1 and 2 of the condescendence were (without any admixture of other funds) invested by the defenders as trustees in the purchase of the lands libelled, and that they were, accordingly, prior to the transactions now challenged, held by them as trustees under these mortifications,—the leading question in the case is whether they have ceased to be so held, and in such manner as to liberate them from the the trusts which originally attached to them.

"It is unnecessary to refer otherwise, than in outline, to the facts, which are not disputed. The defenders, as trustees or office-bearers of the burgh in 1796, took the lands in feu from their own hospital master, i.e. from themselves, as trustees under the mortifications, for the annual feu-duty of £50. It was conceded, and is clear, that this proceeding could not have been maintained against a challenge at the time, or within forty years. But being fortified by prescriptive possession on an ex facie valid feudal title in favour of the treasurer of the burgh, who is the defenders' officer, as the official trustees of the community, just as the hospital master is their officer, as trustees under the mortifications, it is contended that it is no longer challengeable. I am of opinion that this contention must be rejected, on the ground that a trust originally attaching to property cannot, while it remains in the title and possession of the trustees, be cast off by such a change as was here effected, by the mere action of the trustees themselves in the title on which they held it. The arguments on the one side and on the other are obvious, and I should not aid the decision of the case by endeavouring to summarise them.

"The result of this opinion is that since 1796 the rights of the beneficiaries under the mortifications were not satisfied by dividing among them the feu-duty of £50, and that they were entitled to the actual free rents of the lands. But as they only received the feu-duty, thus leaving a considerable arrear of short payments, i.e. of sums to which they were entitled year by year in excess of what they received, the question arises whether the pursuers are entitled to recover these, and this is the second question in the case.

"The pursuers contended that short payments to the beneficiaries must be regarded as so much trust money in the hands of the trustees, and that so regarded they are in titulo to sue for the amount. They do not contend that it ought to be added to capital, and I should think such a contention inadmissible. But the only other view is that the money belongs to those (or the representatives of those) to whom it ought to have been paid year by year. There may or may not be a good answer to their demand, but I am unable to find that the pursuers have any title through them or otherwise to recover the arrears in question.

"The only other question in the case regards the fishings which the defenders in 1801 acquired by crown-grant for behoof of the community of the burgh. It was not contended that the defenders committed any breach of trust in apply-

No. 165.

July 18, 1876. University of Aberdeen v. Magistrates of Aberdeen.

and declares that the lands specified in the summons and on the record as purchased by the defenders' predecessors with funds belonging to the mortifications referred to in articles 1 and 2 of the pursuers' condescendence, are held and possessed by the defenders on the subsisting title thereto, in name of the treasurer of the burgh of Aberdeen, subject to the trusts of the said mortifications, and that the beneficiaries under the said mortifications are, according to their respective rights, entitled to the whole free rents and income arising therefrom subsequent to the date of the summons in this action; but finds that the pursuers are not entitled to an accounting with a view to ascertain or recover the amount of any arrears of short or deficient payments which prior to the action may have been made to the several beneficiaries under said mortifications, reserving to the beneficiaries themselves, or the representatives of such of them as may be dead, to sue for any such arrears according to their respective rights; and with respect to the fishings as distinguished from the lands specified in the summons and record, finds that the pursuers have no right or title thereto, and with respect to them therefore assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the action, and decerns: Finds the pursuers entitle to one-half of the expenses hitherto incurred by them in the process, as the same may be taxed, and remits the account thereof to the Auditor to tax and report: Allows either party to move further in the cause in case a more distinct specification of the lands to which the judgment applies, or any reduction or reformation of the existing title, shall be considered necessary or desirable: Grants leave to either party to reclaim."

Both parties reclaimed.

The pursuers argued;—As to the land the interlocutor was right. The town-council, who held the land as trustees, had sold to themselves. No length of time would bar challenge of such a transaction. The property had remained with the trustee ever since, just as before. There had been no right created in a third party, and no adverse possession. Therefore the law of prescription did not apply. Prescription could never be pleaded by a trustee in answer to a charge of breach of trust.[1] ing for the grant in favour of the community, or that they were under any obligation of trust duty to apply for such a grant for behoof of the mortifications. The Crown may have attached importance or not to the representation that the seaboard lands were the beneficial property of the burgh. The fishings were undoubtedly granted to the burgh, and the Crown is not seeking, on the ground of misrepresentation, or on any other ground, to rescind the grant. It cannot transfer them from the burgh to the university, or declare that they are held subject to the trusts of the mortifications founded on.

---

"The result of the opinion which I have expressed on the several questions referred to, is, 1st, That the lands specified in the summons are held and possessed by the defenders subject to the trust of the mortifications referred to in the first and second articles of the condescendence, and that the pursuers are entitled to have this declared, with such further decree or order as shall be found necessary or convenient to reform the existing title to the lands, and ascertain the right of the beneficiaries to the whole free income for the future subsequent to the date of the action; 2d, That the pursuers are not entitled to an accounting with a view to recover or ascertain the amount of any arrears of short or deficient payments which, prior to the action, may have been made to the several beneficiaries; and 3d, That with respect to the fishings libelled, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor."

[1] Baird v. Mag. of Dundee, Feb. 5, 1862, 24 D. 447, 34 Scot. Jur. 215, March 3, 1863, 1 Macph. H. L. 6, 35 Scot. Jur. 305; Univ. of Aberdeen v. Irvine, Feb. 8, 1866, 4 Macph. 392, 38 Scot. Jur. 259, March 26, 1868, 6 Macph. H. L. 29, 40 Scot. Jur. 459; Presb. of Dundee v. Mag. of Dundee, March 19, 1858, 20 D. 849, 30 Scot. Jur. 452, July 24, 1861, 23 D., H. L., 14, 33 Scot. Jur. 707.

No. 165.

July 18, 1876.
University of Aberdeen v. Magistrates of Aberdeen.

As to the fishings they were granted to the town as proprietors of the adjacent land, but they were so only in trust, and the advantages which they thus acquired as trustees enured to the trust.

The pursuers, Professors Cruickshank and Pirie, had a title to recover arrears due within the last forty years.

The defenders argued;—1. There were two separate trusts—the common good of the burgh, managed by the treasurer, and the mortifications, managed by the master of mortifications. No doubt the town-council were trustees in both. But though a trustee could not prescribe against the trust, when a trustee under one trust entered into a bona fide transaction with another trust, in which he was also trustee, the beneficiaries under the one trust had the benefit of the law of prescription against the other.[1] In the Dundee case, and also in the case of Irvine, the fund remained under the original investiture. There was no change in the title, but only in the mode of administration.

2. The fishing was a substantive grant by the Crown in favour of the city and community of Aberdeen, bearing to be granted out of favour to the city. There was no evidence of trust, and therefore the action was untenable as regards the fishings under the Act 1696, c. 25. Mere physical propinquity was not enough to prevent a trustee from purchasing or acquiring ground beside the trust-estate. Further, where there was a title by gift, there was no obligation on the trustee to communicate that, even if a man falsely represented himself to be proprietor of an estate, and by a private Act of Parliament or grant from the Crown proceeding on that preamble received a gift of it, a Court of law could not hand the gift over to another. The Court had no power to transfer the goodwill of the donor, and could not listen to the statement that the motive of the gift was not really love, favour, and affection to the city of Aberdeen, but some other cause. Suppose it had been represented to the Crown that here was a barren strip of shore belonging to one of the mortifications of Aberdeen, and it was said, "there is a valuable fishing ex adverso,—will you give it to the city?"—was it not very probable that the Crown would have complied with that request?

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—(After stating the facts of the sale in 1797)—The first question that we have to determine is, Whether that is a valid sale, and if so, what is the effect of it? Now, I do not think that is a question that admits of any doubt at all. The town of Aberdeen, acting through the provost, magistrates, and council, were trustees for the parties entitled to benefit by these mortifications, and they were not, as such trustees, entitled to purchase the trust-estate. Yet that is the very thing that they did by this sale in 1797. The master of mortifications was merely their representative in holding the land under the title beginning in 1704, and the treasurer, on the other hand, was merely their hand and instrument in holding the property for their own behoof —I do not say for behoof of the community, because I am speaking of the corporation or community itself in saying that they were trustees. And therefore this is nothing short of a direct sale of the estate by the trustees to themselves for their own behoof, and as such it is plainly an illegal sale, or, in other words, the estate continues to belong to the beneficiaries under the trust just as if no such transaction had ever taken place. We were told indeed that the title which [1] Barns v. Barns' Trustees, March 5, 1857, 19 D. 626, 29 Scot. Jur. 292; Marshall v. Lyell, Feb. 18, 1859, 21 D. 514, 31 Scot. Jur. 282.

No. 165.

July 18, 1876.
University of Aberdeen v. Magistrates of Aberdeen.

was acquired by the treasurer of the burgh in 1797 had been fortified by prescription; but that admits, I think, of a very short answer. No trustee of such an endowment as this can by any course of time prescribe a right to perpetuate a breach of trust. I hold that to be clear in legal principle and settled on authority, and therefore it is needless to dwell further upon the plea of prescription.

Then, if these lands do truly belong to this trust, just as much as if this transaction had never taken place, the next question comes to be whether the fishings which were acquired by a separate title by these trustees also belong to the beneficiaries under the trust. That raises a question of much greater nicety and difficulty. At the time that this illegal sale took place the community of Aberdeen did not, as trustees, possess those fishings. They were acquired after the illegal sale had taken place, in a manner which needs to be very carefully followed and described, but not until about four years after the sale which is said to be illegal, and which, in my opinion, is manifestly illegal. But although that length of time elapsed between the illegal sale of the lands and the acquisition of the fishings, I think it is pretty clearly established by some evidence to which I am about to refer that the very object of the illegal sale by the trustees to themselves was to give an opportunity of acquiring these fishings. One thing is quite clear, that without the title to the lands which they acquired by the illegal sale, they would not have obtained these fishings in the way in which they did obtain them. Whether they could have obtained them in any other way is a different matter; but I think it is pretty clear that without the title to the lands which they acquired by the illegal sale they could not have proceeded to acquire the fishings in the manner they did.

In the year 1801 a petition was presented by the council and community of the burgh of Aberdeen to the Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury. That petition is dated the 16th of May 1801; but it is not immaterial to notice in connection with that a minute of meeting of the town-council of Aberdeen, which bears date 1st of July, just two months afterwards. The provost reported that a committee had inspected the lands of Torrie on the sea-coast "now belonging in property to the treasurer of Aberdeen," that it appeared to them that a salmon-fishing might be carried on in several parts of these grounds; "and as it appeared that the property of the said salmon-fishing in the sea within the said bounds had never yet been granted to any person the committee were advised to apply to the Crown for a grant thereof in favour of the treasurer of Aberdeen, as standing infeft in and proprietor of the adjacent grounds of Torry along the said part of the sea-coast." Now, the ground referred to in that minute is unquestionably the piece of ground which they had acquired by the illegal sale in 1797. It is clear from it, even apart from what is stated in the petition to the Treasury, that the ground upon which the town-council relied in approaching the Crown was, that they were proprietors of this piece of land in the barony of Torry which they had acquired in the manner already described, and in their petition they set themselves out as being proprietors for the use and behoof of the burgh of this piece of ground; and they say, "That a right of salmon-fishing is inter regalia, and belongs to the Crown, but where no private right has been formerly granted or established it has been the practice of the Crown graciously to grant such right to the heritors of the adjacent lands, which occasions the trouble of this application to your Lordships;" and accordingly, they pray that His Majesty may be graciously pleased to grant to the treasurer of Aberdeen, for

No. 165.

July 18, 1876.
University of Aberdeen v. Magistrates of Aberdeen.

behoof of the petitioners, a right of salmon-fishings in the sea opposite the aforesaid lands, and to remit to the Barons of Exchequer to expede the charter in the usual manner. A remit is made to the Barons of Exchequer by the Lords of the Treasury, and there is a good deal of discussion before the Barons of Exchequer. The proprietors of the neighbouring fishings were very anxious apparently to prevent this grant from being made, as affecting their interests. It is immaterial to inquire how it affected their interests, but they appear as opponents of this petition, and of the grant which was sought for; and there are written memorials for the magistrates in support of their application, and written memorials on the other side against them. The ground taken up by the town is throughout that they are proprietors of the land, and that it is the practice of the Crown to grant to the proprietors of lands on the sea-coast the fishings on the sea-coast ex adverso. The opponents of the petition take up, generally, this ground—that the petitioners' title as landowners is a mere pretence, and an illusory thing altogether; that that bit of ground which they have, and in which the treasurer was infeft, is worth nothing, and to represent it as a landed estate to which those sea-fishings could be attached is a mere mockery and a delusion. Now, it is important to observe how it is that the town meets this allegation of the parties on the other side. They say in their memorial—"In the year 1786 the memorialists, for the further improvement of the master of mortifications' half of the said lands of Torry, and of the funds to which they belonged, sold and disposed thereof by way of feu, by public roup, in several different lots, for payment of certain annual feu-duties in victual and money, and by the articles of roup a verge of ground of a certain extent of breadth from the sea-bank, and skirting along part of the south bank of the river Dee to the harbour-mouth, and from thence southward along the coast to the south side of the Bay of Nigg, according to a plan made out at the time, was reserved from the roup, principally with a view of enabling the town-council to purchase the same when necessary, to extend and increase the improvements of the harbour which they were then, and at present are, carrying on at a very considerable expense, as well as with the express view of obtaining a grant of salmon-fishings opposite to those reserved lands." Thus the design of obtaining a grant of salmon-fishing opposite to these reserved lands is represented by the town as having been entertained by the magistrates and council so early as the year 1786. And accordingly it was in pursuance of that plan that the lands were acquired by the town for their own behoof, and to the extinction of the trust by that strange sale from the master of mortifications to the treasurer of Aberdeen. In another place they say, in answer to the case of the parties on the other side—"The memorialists," that is, the town, "paid a consideration for their right," that is, their right to the lands, "with the express view of obtaining a grant of the sea-fishings ex adverso of these lands." Here, again, it is represented that in obtaining the lands under the sale of 1797 they had still the same object in view, viz., the ultimately obtaining a grant to the sea-fishings ex adverso of these lands. Now, the Crown being advised by the Barons of Exchequer, listened favourably to this proposal, and ultimately granted a charter, which we have before us, and which is written to the seal and registered the 27th day of February 1804, by which the salmon-fishings in question are given to the treasurer of the city of Aberdeen and his successors, for the benefit of the provost, bailies, treasurer, council, and community of the said city, and bears to be granted on account of the favour which the Crown had towards the said provost, bailies, treasurer, council, and community of the city of Aberdeen.

No. 165. July 18, 1876. University of Aberdeen v. Magistrates of Aberdeen.

Now, it has been contended with great force that whatever may be said of the way in which this right of salmon-fishing was obtained, or the representations which were made to the Crown as the reasons for asking this grant, the crown-charter is granted to the town of Aberdeen expressly on account of the favour which the Crown bears to the town, and that it is impossible to get the better of that grant,—to have that grant recalled and another grant made in favour of the town as trustees of this charity. I think there is a great deal of force in that, but it does not appear to me that that is the form of the question we have to consider. The question we have to consider is whether, although the town of Aberdeen has got a grant out and out in its own favour of these salmon-fishings, it is not bound to hold them in trust for the beneficiaries under the mortifications in question. It is not proposed, and does not require to be proposed, that any alteration shall be made in this crown-grant. The only question is whether, though being ex facie an absolute grant in favour of the town for its own behoof, the town is not under a legal obligation to communicate the benefit of that grant to the beneficiaries under the mortifications. I have felt that to be a question attended with very considerable difficulty, but upon a full consideration of the matter I have come to be of opinion that the beneficiaries under the mortifications are entitled to the benefit of the crown-grant.

It must be observed, to begin with, that the proper trustee under the deed of 1704 was not the master of mortifications who was the party infeft, nor the provost, and magistrates, and council, as individuals, or even as a collective body, but it was the corporation of Aberdeen that was the trustee. In other words, it was the community of Aberdeen that was the trustee. No doubt, such a corporation or community, being in the position of a trustee, can manage the trust only through its representative and administrative officers—the magistrates and town-council; but still that does not make it the less clear that the true trustee is the corporation itself, and not the administrative officers who for the time represent the corporation. The community of Aberdeen therefore being trustee, sold to itself the lands in question, and it has been shewn, I think by very clear evidence, that that illegal proceeding was entered upon and carried through with an express view to the acquisition of these salmon-fishings. Without the lands the salmon-fishings could not have been acquired; and if the salmon-fishings had been acquired before the lands were transferred from the community, as representing the trust, to the community, for its own behoof, then of course the salmon-fishings so acquired would have enured to the use and benefit of the trust. It was with an express view therefore to prevent that from taking place that they first of all converted the title from a trust title into an absolute title for their own behoof; and that was but a step in the proceeding towards acquiring the salmon-fishing. Having, then, got this absolute title to the lands in themselves, they approach the Crown, and state as the ground of their application that they are the proprietors of these lands. We know quite well—it is a matter of notoriety, and does not require to be established in evidence—that the allegation contained in the petition is quite true, that at that time the Crown was in the habit, where fishings in the sea had not been previously granted, to grant them in favour of the owners of the adjoining land when they applied for them. And accordingly the town of Aberdeen, having apparently, ex facie of its title, a good right of proprietorship in the lands adjoining the coast, asked and obtained, according to that practice, the salmon-fishings in the sea adjoining that land. Now, it appears to me that without the use of the lands, and without the use of the title to these lands, the town never could have got the salmon-fishings.

No. 165.

July 18, 1876.
University of Aberdeen v. Magistrates of Aberdeen.

Then we come to consider whether there is not applicable to the circumstances of such a case this important legal principle, that a trustee can never use either the property of the trust or the title of that trust to advance his own private interests, and if he does so, and is successful in advancing his own private interest, he must communicate that benefit to the trust-estate. Now, it appears to me that that principle is clearly applicable to the circumstances of the case, as disclosed in the evidence to which I have referred. Without the land they could have got no salmon-fishing; by reason of their possession of the property in the lands they did get the salmon-fishing; but they were bound to hold that land which they so used for the purpose of procuring the benefit to themselves for the purposes of the trust, and for no other purpose whatever, and they were not entitled to use it in any way for their own benefit. And yet they did use it for their own benefit, to the effect of obtaining this grant of salmon-fishing. It appears to me that it is very difficult, if not impossible, to resist the conclusion that, acting upon that well-known principle in the law of trusts, the town are bound to communicate the benefit of the fishings so obtained to the persons interested in this trust-estate.

There remains only one other question raised by the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and that refers to the petitory conclusion of the summons. The petitory conclusion of the summons is expressed in very general terms,—as the result of an accounting for the rents of the lands and of the fishings, to make payment to the pursuers of a random sum of £10,000, and so forth. The Lord Ordinary seems to have been of opinion that the pursuers have no title to sue this petitory conclusion at all, but I think his Lordship is under a certain misapprehension in coming to that conclusion. No doubt the leading pursuer, and in one view the only direct pursuer, is the University of Aberdeen; but then the action is brought with the express consent and concurrence of the two gentlemen who at the time were interested in the mortifications in question, viz., Dr Cruickshank, who was professor of mathematics, and so entitled to the proceeds of Dr Liddell's mortification, and Dr Pirie, professor of divinity and church history, who as such was entitled to the proceeds of Coupland's mortification. The action is brought, I say, with their consent and concurrence, and I understand that, in so far as Dr Pirie is concerned, his claim would not extend backwards to so long a period as forty years, and that, as regards Dr Cruickshank, although his tenure of office might extend perhaps beyond that period, it is not proposed that the town should be held liable for anything but the revenues and rents of the subjects within the years of prescription. Now, I must say I cannot quite see what difficulty there is in the University of Aberdeen, with the concurrence of the two persons beneficially interested in these trusts, seeking an accounting and payment for the period within the years of prescription; and therefore, without entering into details at present, I shall merely say that when the amount is ascertained I should be prepared to give decree either in favour of the pursuers in the way in which they are set out on the face of the summons, or in favour of the parties who are individually beneficially interested in the revenue for the time. Dr Cruickshank has died since this action came into Court, but his representatives have been sisted in his place, so that all difficulty on that account is very easily avoided.

No. 165.
July 18, 1876.
University of Aberdeen v. Magistrates of Aberdeen.

Upon the whole matter, therefore, I agree with the Lord Ordinary in so far as he holds the sale in 1797 to be illegal, and the parties interested in the trust to be entitled to the full rents of the lands notwithstanding of that pretended sale. But I differ from him in so far as he excludes from the operation of the trust the salmon-fishings acquired in the manner which I have described; and I differ from him also in so far as regards his view upon the conclusion for accounting and payment.

Lord Deas.—(After narrating the facts as given above)—Now, this was a somewhat peculiar transaction in various respects. More particularly—1st, The minutes of council of 20th and 25th October 1796, by which the magistrates were authorised to bring the subjects to a public sale, and to set up the same at such annual feu-duty as they should deem reasonable and adequate, contained no authority to any one to offer for or purchase the subjects for behoof of the burgh. No written allusion whatever to such an intention was made anywhere prior to the sale.

2d, The most anxious directions were given that the multifarious subjects which were to be sold should be sold in one lot only, the effect of which, of course, was that no competitor who was not prepared to bid for and buy the whole could come into the field at all. Thus the minute of council of 25th October 1796 bears that the committee who had visited and inspected the reserved grounds "were unanimously of opinion that it would be for the interest and advantage of the funds to which they belong that the same should be sold and disposed of altogether by public roup in way of feu at such time as the magistrates think proper," and the magistrates were thereupon authorised "to cause advertise the said reserved lands to be sold by public roup accordingly by way of feu altogether in one lot." The advertisement accordingly intimated that on 21st January 1797 there would be "exposed to public roup and sale by way of feu, all together in one lot, within the Laigh Tolbooth of Aberdeen, sundry parcels of ground lying on the south side of the town of Torry and south pier of Aberdeen," &c. And the articles of roup, after enumerating the various subjects, bore,—"The foresaid whole subjects particularly before-mentioned are to be exposed and set up to roup altogether in one lot at the sum of £50 yearly rent or feu-duty." This was precisely the opposite of the course adopted on the previous occasion in June 1786, when the lands, other than what are called the reserved lands, were feued out under articles of roup in a great variety of lots to suit purchasers.

3d, The provost of the burgh, George More, Esq., was appointed judge of the roup, and the minutes of roup bear that he, as judge foresaid, "appointed the subjects before-described to be entered and set up at the foresaid sum of £50 sterling of yearly feu-duty, and a sand-glass having been set up" (what sort of sand-glass, whether hourly, half-hourly, or what else, is not said) "compeared David Morice, advocate in Aberdeen, and offered the upset price of £50 sterling, and bound himself in terms of the articles of roup; and the said David Morice being the only offerer was declared by the judge of the roup to be the purchaser." All this took place on 21st January 1797, and the minutes to the above effect with a testing-clause in regular form, were duly signed by the provost as judge of the roup, and Mr Morice as purchaser, apparently for his own behoof, on that date accordingly.

The prize being thus, as it was supposed, secured, the true nature of the trans-

No. 165.
July 18, 1876.
University of Aberdeen v. Magistrates of Aberdeen.

action was not disclosed till more than two months thereafter, when Mr Morice, and Gavin Hadden, the treasurer, signed a minute, dated 27th March 1797, declaring that Mr Morice had purchased the subjects for Mr Hadden, "the treasurer of the burgh of Aberdeen, in consequence of powers and authority committed to him for that effect by the magistrates of the said burgh; and transferred and gave up the said purchase accordingly in favour of Gavin Hadden, the present treasurer of Aberdeen, and his successors in office, in name and behalf of the magistrates, town-council, and community thereof." And Mr Hadden, on the other hand, as treasurer foresaid, for himself, by virtue of his office, and in consequence of an Act of council of even date with the minute, accepted of the said purchase in and upon the terms foresaid." Upon the report of the provost, avowing that the magistrates had authorised Mr Morice to purchase the subjects for the burgh, an Act of council was passed of even date with the above minute, ratifying and approving all that had been done, and authorising the treasurer to accept of the purchase for the magistrates, town-council, and community, and to grant an obligation to James Dick, master of mortifications, and his successors in office, for behoof of the united fund called the Six Mortifications, for yearly payment of the feu-duty and performance of the other prestations incumbent on the purchaser by the articles of roup, and empowering Mr Dick to grant a feu-charter in these terms accordingly. The feu-charter I have already narrated, and an obligation by Mr Hadden binding himself and his successors in the office of treasurer to pay the feu-duty to Mr Dick and his successors in the office of master of mortifications followed, and it is not disputed that all that the beneficiaries have since received from the subjects has been the free proceeds of the feu-duty of £50 a-year.

Now, it is quite obvious that if this transaction be not protected by the long prescription of forty years, it cannot for a moment be supported on any ground known in law. The argument at the bar that it was in their individual and not in their corporate capacity that the provost, bailies, and councillors of Aberdeen, and their successors in office, were trustees for the mortifications, will not hold water for a moment. The trust was vested in the corporation or community, and it was the representatives of the corporation or community who in their character of trustees for the mortifications sold the subjects in dispute to themselves in their separate character of a burgh or community. It is unnecessary to say that such a sale was quite illegal, even if it had not been gone about in the covert and collusive manner in which it was, to the manifest injury and defraud of the interests of the beneficiaries under the trust.

Then, as to the plea of the long prescription, I am clearly of opinion that neither the positive nor the negative prescription can avail the defenders in such a case. I had occasion to consider that question in circumstances greatly more complicated and more favourable to the plea than the circumstances of this case, —I mean in the case of Baird and Others v. The Magistrates and Town-Council of Dundee, decided in this Court on 5th February 1862, 24 D. 447, and in the House of Lords, March 3, 1863.[1] The strength of the opinions of the majority of this Court in that case lay in the view taken by the Lord President, that the magistrates and town-council were not there retaining or applying anything for the purposes of the burgh, but were simply alleged to have bestowed

[1] 1 Macph., H. of L., 6.

No. 165.
July 18, 1876.
University of Aberdeen v. Magistrates of Aberdeen.

upon one class of poor persons a portion of the funds belonging to another class of poor persons, and which could not be got back again. His Lordship said—"I would have held a very different opinion in regard to an action against trustees who had kept possession of the property themselves, and had been mismanaging or misapplying it, and especially an action in reference to the future management of the property,"—(p. 455).

That did not appear to me to be a satisfactory distinction, and accordingly I observe that I am reported to have said—"I desiderate any authority for saying that because they are trustees for two charities they can prescribe in favour of themselves in the one capacity and against themselves in the other capacity, although it was all along their duty to challenge and rectify in the one capacity what they did wrong in the other capacity." I have only to repeat that opinion as a fortiori applicable to the plea of prescription in the present case. The judgment of the House of Lords in Baird's case, reversing the decision of the majority of this Court, seems to me to leave that question no longer open. The previous case of the Presbytery of Dundee v. The Magistrates of Dundee, as decided in the Second Division of this Court on 19th March 1858, 20 D. 849, and afterwards in the House of Lords, has also an important bearing on the question of prescription; but as I had occasion to go into that matter very fully in the case of Baird I do not resume it here.

The question which remains in the present case as to the salmon-fishings is a more difficult question than that which relates to the lands.

The defenders have a grant from the Crown of these fishings, dated 27th February 1804, being more than forty years ago. It bears to be conferred upon them "propter favorem," in their corporate capacity, and it is contended that the pursuers cannot competently get behind that grant so as to shew that it is held in trust for them, 1st, because it is fortified by the long prescription as a grant not only to but for the benefit of the corporation; 2d, because there is no written evidence of that trust sufficient to satisfy the statute 1696, c. 25; and 3d, because it does not in any view sufficiently appear that the Crown would have granted the fishings in trust for the mortifications in respect of the proprietorship of the lands, nor that the grant would not have been made to and for the benefit of the corporation although possessed of no adjacent or neighbouring lands.

As regards prescription, and, indeed, as regards the defenders' pleas generally, I have great difficulty in distinguishing the question as to the fishings from the question as to the lands. The one transaction appears to me to have been just the carrying out of the other to its natural and contemplated completion. Very soon after completing the title of the burgh to the lands the defenders set about an investigation into the nature and capability of the fishings locally connected with the lands, with a view to applying to the Crown for a grant of these fishings, with the probable value of which they were previously pretty well acquainted. In the print furnished to us of the minutes of meetings of the town-council there is a hiatus between the date of the town's infeftment in the lands in April 1797 and the 1st July 1801, but it appears from the minute of meeting of that date that a remit upon the subject of the fishings had been made to a committee on 1st October 1800, and that at the meeting on 1st July following, the provost, on behalf of the committee, reported that the committee had been "advised to apply to the Crown for a grant thereof in favour of the treasurer of Aberdeen as standing infeft in and proprietor of the adjacent grounds of Torry along the said part of the sea-coast,"—in pursuance of which report a petition had been presented to the Lords of the Treasury in the council's name for such a grant, which had been remitted to the Barons of Exchequer, and by them to the King's Remembrancer.

No. 165.

July 18, 1876.
University of Aberdeen v. Magistrates of Aberdeen.

The petition itself sets forth that the treasurer of the burgh stood heritably infeft and seised for the use and behoof of the petitioners, the provost, bailies, treasurer, council, and community of Aberdeen, in All and Whole that part of the east division of the lands and barony of Torry therein described, being the lands and others acquired from the master of mortifications in the manner already explained,—that salmon-fishings might be advantageously carried on in the sea adjacent to the foresaid lands, and where no private right "has been formerly granted or established it has been the practice of the Crown graciously to grant such right to the heritors of the adjacent lands, which occasions the trouble of this application to your Lordships." On this footing the petitioners prayed the Commissioners of the Treasury to move His Majesty "to grant to the treasurer of Aberdeen, for behoof of your petitioners, a right of salmon-fishings in the sea opposite to the aforesaid lands;" and on this footing, so far as appears, the grant was ultimately made.

This petition was very solemnly signed and authenticated as the act of the corporation by the signatures of the provost and treasurer appended thereto in name and presence and by appointment of the provost, bailies, treasurer, council, and community, and by attaching thereto the corporate seal, all on 16th May 1801.

I can have no doubt that this petition is admissible and competent evidence to get behind the terms of the crown-grant as in a question between truster and trustee, supposing the proof to be limited to writ or oath of party in terms of the Act 1696, c. 25. It may or may not be thought sufficient to prove the fact that the grant was given to the defenders as proprietors of lands which they held in trust for the mortifications, but its admissibility and competency as evidence under the statute is undoubted. A probative document under the hand of the alleged trustee or trustees is not required by the Act. Any document signed by him or them is admissible and sufficient for that purpose if the trust be thereby acknowledged, as was decided in the case of Taylor or Bryson v. Crawford, 14th November 1833, 12 S. and D. 39. If the petition be admissible and competent evidence, it would be very difficult to say that the memorials and other relative documents presented in explanation and support of that petition could be excluded under the Act 1696, c. 25; and if these be admissible in evidence they make it very clear, not only that it was exclusively in their character of proprietors of the lands in dispute that the petitioners applied for the grant of the fishings, but that the petition was really only the following out of the illegitimate transaction by which they acquired the lands in 1797. The excerpt printed from their memorial bears, inter alia—"The memorialists are asking no more in the present case than what should belong to every proprietor at common law, namely, a right to fish for salmon opposite their own lands. It was with this view, accordingly, that they purchased the greater part of these lands, and reserved from the feu-rights, which they afterwards granted, a space of ground along the coast for the purposes of fishing."

While, however, I think there is here competent and admissible written evidence even as in a question of trust under the Act 1696, I am not to be understood to be of opinion that the statute is applicable to a case of this kind. That statute proceeds on the narrative that the practice of granting blank bonds and other blank writs, "as also that the entrusting of persons without any declarator or back-bond of trust in writing, are occasions of fraud, as also of pleas and contentions," therefore blank writs were in future declared null; and it was enacted that no action of declarator of trust should be sustained "except upon a declarator or back-bond of trust lawfully subscribed by the person alleged to be trustee, and against whom or his heirs or assignees the declarator shall be intented, or unless the same be referred to the oath of the party simpliciter."

No. 165.

July 18, 1876. University of Aberdeen v. Magistrates of Aberdeen.

The object of this enactment was to discourage latent trusts by subjecting the truster to the risk of being taken advantage of by the trustee unless he could produce written evidence of the trust, and at the same time to protect third parties bona fide dealing with the trustee as apparent proprietor from the risk of having their rights defeated by parole testimony of a latent trust. It is a ruled point that the Act does not apply to questions with third parties, but only as between truster and trustee. It contemplates a transaction betweeen two parties—the one the granter of the acknowledgment of trust, and the other the receiver and holder of the document. That enactment cannot, I think, apply here, where the same parties were both trusters and trustees. They might no doubt have voluntarily executed a declaration of trust, but if they did not choose to do so there was no party to demand or exact from them such a document. They were themselves the sole representatives of the only parties who had an interest to insist that such a document should be executed, and the defenders availed themselves of their fiduciary character to claim the grant for themselves which they ought to have claimed for the benefit of the trust, if they claimed it at all. It is not, however, necessary to decide whether the Act 1696, c. 25, is or is not applicable here, because, supposing it to be so, there would still be enough of written evidence clearly competent and admissible to prove the trust. The transaction as to the fishings was in either view just, as I have said, the following out and completing the illegal transaction by which the defenders acquired the lands; and on the whole I do not think it is in their mouths to plead a distinction, either as respects prescription or any of their other pleas, between their position as alleged proprietors of the lands and as alleged proprietors of the fishings. In short, I am of opinion that it ought to be found and declared that both lands and fishings, so far as the interests of the present pursuers are concerned, are held by the defenders in trust for behoof of the mortifications and beneficiaries whose rights are here sought to be vindicated. The terms of the interlocutor to be pronounced, in order to place the titles on a proper footing with reference to the conclusions for declarator and reduction respectively, and likewise for giving due effect to the petitory conclusions so far as insisted in, may require consideration, but in the general result I think the pursuers must be held to be successful.

Lord Mure.—On the first branch of this case I have had no difficulty in concurring with the Lord Ordinary and your Lordships in holding that the lands in question were held in trust for the mortifications. The proceedings shew distinctly that the lands which were so held in trust were purchased by the town, who were the trustees, from themselves; and the statements of parties on record are sufficient, in my opinion, to put that beyond all doubt. In these circumstances, and having regard to the decision in the case of Baird and Others, to which Lord Deas has referred, no plea of prescription can avail the defenders, or entitle them to hold the lands on any other terms than that of a trust for the mortifications.

The question of the fishings is certainly attended with a good deal of nicety; but in dealing with this question we must keep in view the broad fact that at the date when these fishings were acquired the lands ex adverso of which they lay were held by the town in trust. It was in respect of the town holding these lands that they applied for the grant, and it was given to them on that account. The charter no doubt contains the usual words about its being granted for the benefit of the community; but it declares that the grant made to the treasurer is a grant of the salmon-fishings in the sea adjacent to the lands which the treasurer held for the community. Now, the treasurer did not hold these lands for the benefit of the community. The community held the lands for the benefit of the mortifications, and the town state in their petition as ground on which they mainly rely for obtaining the grant, that "where no private right has been formerly granted or established it has been the practice of the Crown graciously to grant such right to the heritors of the adjacent lands." In respect of this application the Crown took the matter into consideration, and made a grant of the fishings. In these circumstances it appears to me that the principle upon which we have proceeded in disposing of the question of the lands applies as clearly and distinctly to the fishings. The town got them as parties holding a property for the benefit of the mortification, and they must, I think, be held upon the face of their own petition and the proceedings following upon it, to have acquired the fishings under the same condition as that on which they held the lands, viz., of holding them for the benefit of the trust-estate. I therefore concur with your Lordships.

LORD ARDMILLAN was absent, but it was stated that he concurred in the judgment.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the said interlocutor: Find that the lands specified in the conclusions of the summons were purchased in 1704 by the corporation of Aberdeen with funds belonging to the mortifications mentioned in the first and second articles of the condescendence, and to four other mortifications: Find that the said lands were held by the said corporation till the year 1797 on titles expressing in grœmio the several trusts subject to which the lands were so held: Find that in the year 1797 the said lands were sold by the corporation, as trustees for the mortifications to the said corporation for its own behoof, in consideration of a feu-duty of £50: Find that the said sale was illegal and void, and that the said lands, notwithstanding the said sale, are held and possessed by the defenders on the subsisting title thereto in name of the treasurer of the burgh of Aberdeen, subject to the trusts of the said mortifications: Find that the corporation in entering into the illegal transaction aforesaid acquired or attempted to acquire the said lands as the estate of the corporation itself, for the purpose of being thereby enabled to apply to the commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury for a grant in favour of the corporation of the salmon-fishings in the Dee ex adverso of the said lands, according to a practice then prevalent of the Crown granting rights of salmon-fishing in the sea to proprietors whose lands were bounded by the shore, merely on the consideration of

No. 165.

July 18, 1876. University of Aberdeen v. Magistrates of Aberdeen.

their being proprietors of such lands: Find that in pursuance of such purpose, the corporation, in the year 1801, presented a petition to the Lords of the Treasury, setting forth that they were absolute proprietors of the said lands, in their own right, and on that ground praying for a grant of salmon-fishings in the sea ex adverso of the said lands, for the benefit of the corporation: Find that the prayer of the said petition was granted, and a crown-charter in favour of the corporation conveying the said salmon-fishings was expede, which is written to the seal and registered 27th February 1804: Find that the corporation have ever since possessed, and do now possess, the said salmon-fishings, in virtue of the said charter: Find that the corporation, being the trustee for the said mortifications, having thus used the trust-estate, and the title thereof vested in them, for the purpose of obtaining a benefit to themselves, are bound to communicate that benefit to the trust-estate and the parties interested therein, and are bound to hold and administer the said salmon-fishings as part of the said trust-estate, and to apply the revenues and profits thereof to the benefit of the parties interested as beneficiaries in the said mortifications: Therefore find, declare, and decern, in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the summons: Find under the petitory conclusions that the concurring pursuer, Dr W. R. Pirie, is entitled to a share of the revenues and profits of the trust-estate corresponding to his tenure of the professorship of divinity and church history from December 1843, the date of his appointment, till the date of citation: Find also under the petitory conclusions that the late John Cruickshank, as concurring pursuer, was, and his representatives, who have been sisted in his place, are entitled to a share of the profits and revenues of the trust-estate corresponding to his tenure of the professorship of mathematics from or about the year 1833 till the year 1858: Find that the said shares of the profits and revenues of the trust-estate for the said periods may competently be ascertained and decerned for in the present action: Find the pursuers entitled to the expenses hitherto incurred by them," &c.

M'EWEN & CARMENT, W.S.—T. J. GORDON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 166.

JOHN ROBERTSON, Petitioner.—Begg.

July 18, 1876. Robertson.

Process—Petition—Reclaiming Note—Competency—Law Agents Act, 1873 (36 and 37 Vict. cap. 63, sec. 7).—Sec. 7 of the Law Agents Act provides "that a petition by a person to be admitted as a law-agent may be presented to any Judge of the Court officiating as a Lord Ordinary, and the proceedings under the same may take place and be conducted before the same or any other Judge according to the judicial arrangements in the Court for the time being, and a single Judge shall be entitled to act as the Court with reference to all petitions for admission as a law-agent under this Act." Held that a reclaiming note against the judgment of the Lord Ordinary was competent.

Observed (per Lord President) that the power of the Inner-House to review any interlocutor of a Lord Ordinary is not taken away by implication.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Young. B.

THIS was a petition presented in terms of the 10th section of the Law Agents Act, 36 and 37 Vict. cap. 63.

The petitioner maintained that he was entitled to be admitted without examination, in respect that, at the passing of the Law Agents Act, he was entitled to be admitted under the Procurators Act of 1865.

No. 166.

July 18, 1876.
Robertson.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the usual interlocutor, remitting to the examiners to take trial of the petitioner's qualifications.

The petitioner asked leave to reclaim, which was granted, reserving all questions of competency.

On the question of competency the petitioner argued;—The expression "Lord Ordinary" in sec. 7 of the Law Agents Act* shewed that review was intended. Review of a Lord Ordinary's judgment was always competent, unless expressly excluded.[1]

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The first point to be disposed of here is as regards competency. It arises in the matter of a petition by John Robertson, writer in Edinburgh, for admission as enrolled law-agent. Lord Young, to whom the petition was presented, has remitted to the examiners to make trial of the petitioner's qualifications, &c. The petitioner is dissatisfied, because he thinks he is entitled to be admitted without examination. The Lord Ordinary has suggested a doubt as to a point of importance, whether his interlocutor here could be submitted to review. That depends on the 7th section of the Law Agents Act, which provides—"The petition may be presented to any Judge of the Court officiating as a Lord Ordinary, and the proceedings under the same may take place and be conducted before the same or any other Judge according to the judicial arrangements in the Court for the time being, and a single Judge shall be entitled to act as the Court with reference to all petitions for admission as a law-agent under this Act."

The difficulty arises from the last clause of this provision. But, notwithstanding the ambiguity of the expression, we are of opinion, and the Judges of the Second Division, whom we have consulted, agree with us, that this reclaiming note is not incompetent. The true meaning is that the petitioner is, in the first instance, to apply to a Lord Ordinary, it may be in the Outer-House, but it may also be to a Lord Ordinary on the Bills. The form of the expression arises from the fact that it is meant to include any Judge who may for the time being be the Lord Ordinary. But the power of the Inner-House to review any interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is not to be taken away by implication, and there is nothing here which expressly takes it away.

LORD DEAS and LORD MURE concurred.

LORD ARDMILLAN was absent.

THE COURT, after hearing further argument on the merits, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sustain the competency of the reclaiming note, but refuse the same on the merits, and adhere to the interlocutor complained against."

.—Agent.

---

* Quoted in the Lord President's opinion.

[1] Judicature Act, 6 Geo. IV. cap. 120, sec. 18; Otis v. Kidston, Jan. 31, 1862, 24 D. 419—see Lord Justice-Clerk's remark, p. 426, 34 Scot. Jur. 206.

No. 165.

July 18, 1876.
University of Aberdeen v. Magistrates of Aberdeen.

their being proprietors of such lands: Find that in pursuance of such purpose, the corporation, in the year 1801, presented a petition to the Lords of the Treasury, setting forth that they were absolute proprietors of the said lands, in their own right, and on that ground praying for a grant of salmon-fishings in the sea ex adverso of the said lands, for the benefit of the corporation: Find that the prayer of the said petition was granted, and a crown-charter in favour of the corporation conveying the said salmon-fishings was expede, which is written to the seal and registered 27th February 1804: Find that the corporation have ever since possessed, and do now possess, the said salmon-fishings, in virtue of the said charter: Find that the corporation, being the trustee for the said mortifications, having thus used the trust-estate, and the title thereof vested in them, for the purpose of obtaining a benefit to themselves, are bound to communicate that benefit to the trust-estate and the parties interested therein, and are bound to hold and administer the said salmon-fishings as part of the said trust-estate, and to apply the revenues and profits thereof to the benefit of the parties interested as beneficiaries in the said mortifications: Therefore find, declare, and decern, in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the summons: Find under the petitory conclusions that the concurring pursuer, Dr W. R. Pirie, is entitled to a share of the revenues and profits of the trust-estate corresponding to his tenure of the professorship of divinity and church history from December 1843, the date of his appointment, till the date of citation: Find also under the petitory conclusions that the late John Cruickshank, as concurring pursuer, was, and his representatives, who have been sisted in his place, are entitled to a share of the profits and revenues of the trust-estate corresponding to his tenure of the professorship of mathematics from or about the year 1833 till the year 1858: Find that the said shares of the profits and revenues of the trust-estate for the said periods may competently be ascertained and decerned for in the present action: Find the pursuers entitled to the expenses hitherto incurred by them," &c.

M'EWEN & CARMENT, W.S.—T. J. GORDON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 166.

JOHN ROBERTSON, Petitioner.—Begg.

July 18, 1876.
Robertson.

Process—Petition—Reclaiming Note—Competency—Law Agents Act, 1873 (36 and 37 Vict. cap. 63, sec. 7).—Sec. 7 of the Law Agents Act provides "that a petition by a person to be admitted as a law-agent may be presented to any Judge of the Court officiating as a Lord Ordinary, and the proceedings under the same may take place and be conducted before the same or any other Judge according to the judicial arrangements in the Court for the time being, and a single Judge shall be entitled to act as the Court with reference to all petitions for admission as a law-agent under this Act." Held that a reclaiming note against the judgment of the Lord Ordinary was competent.

Observed (per Lord President) that the power of the Inner-House to review any interlocutor of a Lord Ordinary is not taken away by implication.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Young.
B.

THIS was a petition presented in terms of the 10th section of the Law Agents Act, 36 and 37 Vict. cap. 63.

The petitioner maintained that he was entitled to be admitted without examination, in respect that, at the passing of the Law Agents Act, he was entitled to be admitted under the Procurators Act of 1865.

No. 166.

July 18, 1876.
Robertson.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the usual interlocutor, remitting to the examiners to take trial of the petitioner's qualifications.

The petitioner asked leave to reclaim, which was granted, reserving all questions of competency.

On the question of competency the petitioner argued;—The expression "Lord Ordinary" in sec. 7 of the Law Agents Act* shewed that review was intended. Review of a Lord Ordinary's judgment was always competent, unless expressly excluded.[1]

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The first point to be disposed of here is as regards competency. It arises in the matter of a petition by John Robertson, writer in Edinburgh, for admission as enrolled law-agent. Lord Young, to whom the petition was presented, has remitted to the examiners to make trial of the petitioner's qualifications, &c. The petitioner is dissatisfied, because he thinks he is entitled to be admitted without examination. The Lord Ordinary has suggested a doubt as to a point of importance, whether his interlocutor here could be submitted to review. That depends on the 7th section of the Law Agents Act, which provides—"The petition may be presented to any Judge of the Court officiating as a Lord Ordinary, and the proceedings under the same may take place and be conducted before the same or any other Judge according to the judicial arrangements in the Court for the time being, and a single Judge shall be entitled to act as the Court with reference to all petitions for admission as a law-agent under this Act."

The difficulty arises from the last clause of this provision. But, notwithstanding the ambiguity of the expression, we are of opinion, and the Judges of the Second Division, whom we have consulted, agree with us, that this reclaiming note is not incompetent. The true meaning is that the petitioner is, in the first instance, to apply to a Lord Ordinary, it may be in the Outer-House, but it may also be to a Lord Ordinary on the Bills. The form of the expression arises from the fact that it is meant to include any Judge who may for the time being be the Lord Ordinary. But the power of the Inner-House to review any interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is not to be taken away by implication, and there is nothing here which expressly takes it away.

LORD DEAS and LORD MURE concurred.

LORD ARDMILLAN was absent.

THE COURT, after hearing further argument on the merits, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sustain the competency of the reclaiming note, but refuse the same on the merits, and adhere to the interlocutor complained against."

.—Agent.

---

* Quoted in the Lord President's opinion.

[1] Judicature Act, 6 Geo. IV. cap. 120, sec. 18; Otis v. Kidston, Jan. 31, 1862, 24 D. 419—see Lord Justice-Clerk's remark, p. 426, 34 Scot. Jur. 206.

No. 167.

July 18, 1876.
Cooper and M'Leod v. Edinburgh Improvement Trustees, &c.

COOPER AND M'LEOD, Pursuers.—D.-F. Watson—J. P. B. Robertson.
JOHN KNOX CRAWFORD, Clerk to and as representing the Edinburgh Improvement Trustees, Defender.—M'Laren—Mackay—Harper.
JOHN M'KELLAR, Defender.—Campbell Smith—M'Kechnie.
THOMAS BRADY, Defender.—Guthrie Smith.

Property—Access.—Circumstances in which held that an obligation to construct an access to certain subjects in a town "in a proper and sufficient manner, so as to admit of a carriage or cart to pass thereon," was not implemented by leaving a passage nine feet wide, the passage so left being an access to dwelling-houses having doors in the passage as well as to the subjects behind, and a minimum width of twelve feet fixed.

Property—Servitude—Real Burden.—The front portion of certain house property was sold, the seller retaining the back portion. The disposition, which was duly recorded in the Register of Sasines, contained an obligation upon the purchaser forthwith to construct at his own expense a sufficient access from the street to the back portion, but the position and width of the stipulated access were not defined. The purchaser resold the subjects without having constructed a sufficient access, stipulating that his disponee should not be entitled to inspect the titles, and not giving him notice of the obligation in question. Held in an action by the proprietor of the back portion against the original purchaser of the front portion and his disponee that an effectual servitude of passage had been constituted.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Curriehill. I.

SIR GEORGE and Miss Cecilia Kinloch were the proprietors of tenements of houses and ground behind situated on the south side of the Grassmarket, Edinburgh.

In May 1874 the Edinburgh Improvement Trustees, for the improvement of that part of the town, purchased a part of the subjects, being that part which immediately fronted the Grassmarket.

The disposition by Sir George and Miss Kinloch to the improvement trustees, which was duly recorded in the Register of Sasines, contained this declaration:—"It is hereby expressly conditioned and declared that our said disponees shall be bound and obliged, as by acceptation hereof they bind and oblige themselves, at their own expense, forthwith to make and construct, in a proper and sufficient manner, an access from the Grassmarket to the property belonging to us, lying to the south of that hereby conveyed, in lieu of East and West Smith's Closes, by which access is at present obtained, and which access shall be constructed so as to admit a carriage or cart to pass thereon, and shall be upheld and maintained in good and sufficient repair by our said disponees or their foresaids." *

Nothing was said in the disposition as to the manner in which the property lying behind to the south was to be occupied, nor were the dimensions and position of the access specified.

The improvement trustees pulled down the houses upon the ground acquired by them from Sir G. Kinloch, as well as the houses upon contiguous properties facing the Grassmarket, which they had also acquired. They exposed the area for sale, one of the conditions of sale being that the disponees should be bound to erect buildings conform to a plan prepared by the architects of the trust; and another condition being, that the disponees should not be entitled to require inspection of the titles.

* The dispositive clause was,—"We, in consideration of paid to us by the trustees under the 'Edinburgh Improvement Act, 1867,' do hereby sell, alienate, dispone, convey, assign, and make over from us, our heirs and successors, to the said improvement trustees, their successors and assignees, for ever, according to the true intent and meaning of the said Act, heritably and irredeemably."

No. 167.

July 18, 1876.
Cooper and M'Leod v. Edinburgh Improvement Trustees, &c.

The access from the Grassmarket to the back property retained by Sir G. Kinloch was formerly by two closes named East and West Smith's Closes. In place of these, the proposed access, as laid down in the plan, consisted of a covered passage or pend much in the line of East Smith's Close, nine feet wide, through the tenement facing Grassmarket, and thence an open passage, about twelve feet wide, running up by steep gradients to Sir G. Kinloch's property. On each side of the pend there was a door leading to a common stair.

In May 1875 Cooper and M'Leod, brewers, acquired from Sir G. Kinloch the remaining portion of the property belonging to him, with an assignation to the right of access provided in the disposition of the front property to the improvement trustees.

Cooper and M'Leod proceeded to erect a brewery upon their property.

In November 1875 they raised the present action against the improvement trustees, and also against John M'Kellar and Thomas Brady, who had, as the pursuers alleged, purchased or agreed to purchase from the improvement trustees the ground which the latter had purchased from Sir G. Kinloch. The conclusions of the summons were for declarator that the improvement trustees and their disponees in the subjects were bound, "at their own expense, forthwith to make and construct, in a proper and sufficient manner, an access from the Grassmarket of Edinburgh to the property acquired by the pursuers from the said Sir George Kinloch and Miss Cecilia Kinloch, and now belonging to the pursuers, lying to the south of the property conveyed by the foresaid disposition, to be constructed, the said access, so as to admit a carriage or cart to pass thereon, and to uphold and maintain the same in good and sufficient repair in all time coming," and that the said obligation had not as yet been implemented, and for decree against the improvement trustees, and in the event of the subjects having been conveyed to the other defenders in whole or in part, against them also, to construct and maintain an access in terms of the declaratory conclusions.

The pursuers averred that the access provided was insufficient.

The improvement trustees pleaded that the access was sufficient.

M'Kellar admitted that he had acquired, by contract of ground-annual dated October 1875, a part of the ground purchased by the improvement trustees from Sir G. Kinloch, viz., the part lying to the west of the proposed access. He pleaded;—(1) This defender is entitled to absolvitor, in respect the obligation founded on by the pursuer is not a real burden, and is not a matter of contract with this defender.

Brady explained that, although he was the proprietor of the ground which formed the east side of the covered part of proposed access, he had acquired that ground from a third party and not from the improvement trustees, to whom it had never belonged. He admitted that he had acquired from the trustees a small piece of ground to the rear forming part of the subjects which they had purchased from Sir G. Kinloch. He maintained that he was under no obligation to give up ground to widen the access.

A proof was taken as between the pursuers and the improvement trustees, by the result of which the other defenders agreed to be bound, the process being meanwhile sisted as against them. The evidence consisted chiefly of the opinions of architects and engineers as to the proper breadth of an access for carts. The pursuers also adduced as witnesses persons practically engaged in carting heavy loads, who were of opinion that a passage only nine feet wide would be very dangerous in the circumstances.

No. 167.

July 18, 1876. Cooper and M'Leod v. Edinburgh Improvement Trustees, &c.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced these interlocutors:—

"22d January 1876.—Recalls the sist as to the defenders, Thomas Brady and John M'Kellar, contained in the interlocutor of the 11th December last: Finds that, under and in virtue of a disposition of Sir George Kinloch of Kinloch, and Miss Cecilia Kinloch, then residing in Carnoustie, dated 8th and 12th, and recorded 22d May 1874, of those subjects situated on the south side of the Grassmarket, more particularly described in the said disposition in favour of the trustees under the Edinburgh Improvement Act, 1867, 30 and 31 Vict. cap. 43, the said Edinburgh Improvement Trustees, according to the true intent and meaning of the foresaid Act, became bound, at their own expense, forthwith to make and construct, in a proper and sufficient manner, an access from the Grassmarket of Edinburgh to the property then belonging to the said Sir George Kinloch and Miss Cecilia Kinloch, lying to the south of the property conveyed by the foresaid disposition, to be constructed, the said access, so as to admit a carriage or cart to pass thereon, and to uphold and maintain the same in good and sufficient repair in all time coming: Find that the pursuers afterwards acquired said property lying to the south of the property so acquired by the said improvement trustees, conform to disposition in the pursuers' favour, granted by Sir George Kinloch with consent of Miss Cecilia Kinloch, dated 15th and 20th May 1875, which last mentioned disposition contains an assignation in favour of the pursuers of Sir George Kinloch's right to the said access, provided for in the disposition to the said improvement trustees: Finds that the said access must be of the width of at least twelve feet; and before farther answer, appoints the cause to be enrolled for further procedure, reserving all questions of expenses."

"4th March 1876.—Finds, with reference to the findings in the interlocutor of 22d January 1876, and in addition thereto, that the defenders, the Edinburgh Improvement Trustees, were duly infeft in the property in the Grassmarket, acquired by them from Sir George Kinloch and Miss Cecilia Kinloch, by the registration of the disposition thereof in their favour in the Register of Sasines for the city of Edinburgh on 22d May 1874, and that the obligation to make, construct, uphold, and maintain the access mentioned in said interlocutor is contained at length in the disposition so recorded: Finds that after the said disposition was so recorded the said improvement trustees conveyed part of said property to the defender, John M'Kellar, and part to the defender, Thomas Brady, and that the said John M'Kellar and Thomas Brady are the successors and assignees of the improvement trustees in the foresaid parts of said property: Finds that, according to the sound construction of said disposition, the said access is to be constructed from the Grassmarket through the said property to the property on the south thereof, now belonging to the pursuers, and that the obligation to make, construct, uphold, and maintain the said access is effectually imposed, not only upon the said improvement trustees, but also upon their successors and assignees in said property: Finds that the obligation to make and construct said access has not been implemented: Therefore, decerns and declares in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the summons: Ordains the defenders, the Edinburgh Improvement Trustees, John M'Kellar, and Thomas Brady, forthwith to make and construct, in a proper and sufficient manner, an access from the Grassmarket to the pursuers' said property of the width of not less than twelve feet, all in accordance with the findings of the interlocutor of 22d January last, and of this interlocutor, and that at the sight of Mr George Cunningham, civil engineer, Edinburgh, and thereafter to uphold and maintain the said access in good and sufficient repair in all time coming, and decerns; reserving to the defenders all claim of relief inter se which may be competent to them, or any of them: Finds the defenders liable to the pursuers in expenses," &c.

No. 167.

July 18, 1876.

Cooper and M'Leod v. Edinburgh Improvement Trustees, &c.

The defenders reclaimed. Besides maintaining that a sufficient access had been constructed, they argued that the obligation, being indefinite as to the position and dimensions of the access, was not one of the recognised servitudes, nor was it validly made a real burden on the lands. It was a mere personal obligation on the disponees, which should have been enforced before the buildings were commenced.[1]

At advising,—

LORD GIFFORD.—It is much to be regretted that in a special stipulation in a mutual contract, whereby a new and different entrance from that formerly in existence from the Grassmarket to Sir George Kinloch's back property was to be constructed, the width and nature of that access should not have been more clearly and precisely defined, and it is still more to be regretted that when the improvement trustees came, at their own hands, to make and construct the access, they should have done so without consulting the creditors in the obligation, or even without intimating to them what sort of access they proposed to make and to hand over in terms of their obligation. If any inconvenience shall arise to the improvement trustees from thus determining at their own hands, and without consultation with or intimation to anybody, the extent of the obligation to construct the access, I think the trustees have themselves to blame. It appears to me that the present pursuers have timeously challenged the sufficiency of the proposed access, and that the present question must be decided very much in the same way as if no building operations had yet been commenced.

I concur in opinion with the Lord Ordinary that, looking to the nature of the proposed access, and the whole surrounding circumstances, the width offered by the defenders, being nine feet, is not sufficient either for safety or convenience, but that the access should be at least twelve feet in width. It is true that the question to a large extent is one of discretion, and it is also true that there may be in the city or elsewhere entrances not very dissimilar from the present which are only nine feet in width, or even less; but the question in the present case is not what is the narrowest possible entrance which will be practicable, or barely practicable, for the necessary traffic, but what is the true and reasonable meaning of the obligation to construct an access in a proper and sufficient manner, "so as to admit a carriage or cart to pass thereon." Now, this must mean that the carriage or cart shall pass with reasonable convenience and with reasonable safety, so as not to endanger either the carriage or cart and its loading, or any other persons entitled to use the passage. Perhaps it might have been held that if the access had been handed over to the pursuers for their exclusive use, so that the pursuers might themselves command it wholly, and protect it with a gate at either end, so as to keep it clear on each occasion of the passage of a carriage or cart, a width of nine feet might have been enough. But this is not the condition of the case before us. The access offered is not for the exclusive use of the pursuers; it is to serve also as an access for the new tenements which are

---

[1] Authorities cited.—Stair, ii. 3, 55; Bell's Com., M'L.'s edn., vol. i. p. 727; Bell's Pr. 919; Tailors of Aberdeen v. Coutts, Aug. 3, 1840, 1 Rob. App. 296; M. Bell's Lectures on Conveyancing, vol. i., p. 574, &c., vol. ii., p. 1063.

No. 167.

July 18, 1876. Cooper and M'Leod v. Edinburgh Improvement Trustees, &c.

being erected facing the Grassmarket, and, as I understand, common stairs enter from it on either side, at or very close to its narrowest portion. Now, it is impossible not to see that, taking even six feet as the breadth of a loaded cart or carriage, and there is evidence that this is less than often occurs, a breadth of 1½ feet on each side between the loaded cart and the wall or the entry to the common stairs is not enough to secure the reasonable safety of inhabitants or foot passengers having occasion to use this access. That safety might possibly be secured by the exercise of unusual care or precautions may be true, but in construing the obligation to give an access I think such an access must be given the use of which will not involve unusual precautions or uncommon care on the part either of the carters or of the foot passengers. The mere existence of risk must if possible be avoided, and that can best be done, when such a passage is to be used both by carts and by foot passengers, by securing a sufficient foothpath free of and outside the flanged tramway, by which, as I understand it, carts and carriages are confined and guided.

I concur with the Lord Ordinary, therefore, in finding that the access, in present circumstances, should not be less than twelve feet in width.

The next question is, how is this access to be enforced and made, and can it be enforced against all the defenders, or any and which of them? In the first place, I hold the obligation to subsist and to be still incumbent on the defenders, the improvement trustees. They are the direct obligants in the original contract; they themselves expressly undertook to make and construct the access; and nothing has occurred, nothing has been done by the pursuers or anybody else, which relieves the improvement trustees from this obligation. They are plainly still bound thereby, and if, by reason of rights acquired by singular successors, to whom the obligation has not passed, or if in any other way the trustees are no longer able specifically to implement their obligation, they would be liable in damages for breach thereof; but if they can still specifically give performance they must do so, unless the creditors choose to waive or to compromise their claim.

The other defenders, however, Thomas Brady and John M'Kellar, stand in different positions; and in order to see how far the improvement trustees can give specific implement of their obligation it is necessary to inquire how far the other defenders are bound either to implement the obligation themselves, or to submit to have it implemented by the trustees—that is, to allow the ground necessary for the access to be taken from their respective feus. The Lord Ordinary has decerned ad factum præstandum against the whole three defenders without distinction, and without defining their respective rights. I hardly think that this part of his Lordship's interlocutor should be affirmed, and I doubt how far or in what manner it could be wrought out, even if it were affirmed.

The defender Brady and the defender M'Kellar stand in different positions. Brady's property is on the left-hand of the proposed access—that is, on the left side as you enter the access from the Grassmarket; but then it appears that this part of Brady's property was not acquired from the improvement trustees at all, although another and back part of his property was so acquired. I am of opinion that, according to a sound reading of the contract between the trustees and Sir George Kinloch the servitude of access, assuming a servitude of access to be thereby constituted, does not apply to the property now belonging to Brady, in so far as that did not flow from the trustees, or from their author, Sir George Kinloch. It seems plain that if Brady had not purchased anything from the trustees, but had contented himself with remaining proprietor of the ground to the left of the proposed access, which he had acquired from a third party free from all burden or servitude, that ground would have been subject to no servitude whatever in favour either of Sir George Kinloch or of his successors, the present pursuers. If this be so, it seems to make no difference that Brady has acquired from the trustees, besides his original front subjects, a back piece of property originally belonging to Sir George Kinloch. That circumstance will never subject his front property, independently acquired from a third party, to any servitude from which it would otherwise have been free, unless there had been some special bargain to this effect, and of this there is no averment or pretence. It follows that Brady, not being as to his front property a successor of the improvement trustees, and not being liable, qua proprietor of that property, to any servitude, is not bound to submit to have any part of his front property taken for the purpose of widening the proposed access. But then it is said that Brady, in building his new wall on the left side of the passage going south, has encroached upon the old line of East Smith's Close, and therefore has really built upon land subject to the servitude. I am not sure that I fully understand the state of the titles, and the exact position of the boundary of Mr Brady's property. Probably, if the alleged encroachment has taken place, merely as an arrangement for straightening or squaring the line of the gable, so as to make it run at right angles to the street instead of in a slightly slanting or oblique direction, this may make no difference. I understand that Brady's old boundary was the centre line of the old gable, and if the new gable has been built in a somewhat different position by mere arrangement, for the purpose above mentioned, and without any new title or conveyance, and if the title stands just as it was before, I cannot think that this makes any difference on the rights of parties, or subjects Brady's property to a servitude or liability from which it was formerly free. If Brady's back property were required to widen the access the case would be different; but if I am right in the view above suggested, then I think Brady must ultimately be assoilzied from this action. It would, however, be unsafe to grant absolvitor at present.

I come to a different result as regards M'Kellar. I think the obligation to give an access contained in the disposition by Sir George Kinloch to the improvement trustees, and made real by infeftment or registration, effectually constituted a servitude of access in favour of Sir George's back property over the front property conveyed to the improvement trustees—a servitude indefinite as to the position of the access, which was in the option of the servient proprietor, but real quoad the dominant tenement and its owner, and effectually running with the lands. This servitude was published on record. It was on the face of the improvement trustees' title, and I think was well made a real burden affecting the servient subjects. I am, therefore, of opinion that M'Kellar, though in some senses a singular successor in the servient subject, is bound by the servitude—that is, is bound to submit to have the access properly constructed, and made of a proper width, and the result is that he is bound, as servient owner, to submit to have taken from his ground, and added to the existing access, the additional width of three feet. It seems to be true that under the articles of roup the improvement trustees did not disclose their title to Mr M'Kellar, and did not tell him the terms of the servitude, or of the obligation they were under to give an access; and although this might have been discovered from the records, I see no reason to doubt that Mr M'Kellar took his feu, and proceeded to build according to the plans furnished to him by the trustees, in the bona fide belief that he was entitled so to do, and was not bound to leave any wider access than the access shewn upon the plans of nine feet in width. Indeed I think this may be held to have been warranted to him by the trustees; and therefore, while I think he is bound now to give from his feu, on the right-hand of the access going up from the Grassmarket, sufficient ground—that is, about three feet—so as to make the access twelve feet wide, I would reserve to Mr M'Kellar his whole claims of relief or damages against the improvement trustees, on the ground that he has been misled or misdirected by them into taking his feu according to their measurements, and building thereon according to their plans, and to the trustees their answers as accords. In the present action I doubt whether we can do more than reserve these claims; but I cannot help thinking that they should not be disputed, and abatement or compensation should be made to Mr M'Kellar upon reasonable terms.

No. 167.
July 18, 1876.
Cooper and M'Leod v. Edinburgh Improvement Trustees, &c.

The result is that, adhering to the Lord Ordinary's view as to the width of the access, I would humbly propose that we should in the meantime decern against the improvement trustees alone to make the passage of the width now fixed, and in a proper manner. But I think we should also find that the trustees are entitled to take from their feuars, so far as these feuars derive right from them, and from the ground feued from the trustees, whatever land may be necessary to make the proper access, and of the proper width, and that to this extent their feuars, as such, are bound to give or allow to be taken the ground necessary so to widen the access; and farther, that we should reserve all claims for relief or damages as accords, and all other questions in the case.

Lord Neaves concurred.

Lord Ormidale.—In regard to the width of the passage I entirely concur with Lord Gifford in thinking that the Lord Ordinary has come to a right conclusion. But I cannot agree with his Lordship as to how far the obligations in question are incumbent on all the defenders alike. The obligations are to the effect, 1st, to construct the access, and 2dly, to uphold it. Now, it rather appears to me that these obligations are subject to different considerations. If the passage had been originally constructed of the proper width by the improvement trustees before they disponed the ground in feu, it occurs to me that they would have done all that was required of them to fulfil any obligations incumbent on them. I cannot think that the obligation to maintain the access was intended to remain for ever in operation against the improvement trustees, notwithstanding that the access had been properly constructed. On the contrary, I am disposed to think that the obligation to keep up the access would, after its proper construction, lie on the parties in possession as proprietors for the time. But, in point of fact, the access never has been properly constructed, and therefore, while I throw out these observations, I do not think it necessary to pronounce any precise findings on the subject of them, at least at present. Let us first have the access constructed of a proper width. I am of opinion, accordingly, that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to in so far as it ordains the improvement trustees to construct an access of twelve feet in width, but that the question of the maintenance of the access after it is constructed should be in the meantime reserved. It is not improbable, at least it is to be hoped, that an equitable arrangement may be come to, so as to avoid all farther litigation and expense.

No. 167.

July 18, 1876.
Cooper and M'Leod v. Edinburgh Improvement Trustees, &c.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur substantially in the opinions delivered. This is a perplexing, and in some respects a difficult case. The difficulty has been caused by the irregular action of the improvement trustees. In the first place, they prepare their feuing plan without any communication with the party in right of the obligation, and at their own hands fix the dimensions of the access. In the second place, they introduce into the articles of roup a clause by which the disponees are not to know anything of the titles of their authors. The present case is a strong illustration of the inconvenience of such a stipulation. Here we have a purchase made by so many feet of frontage, which it now turns out the trustees have not to dispose of. The buildings have been completed, and apparently the only way in which our judgment can be given effect to is by pulling down one or both of the buildings which adjoin the entry. This would be a most unfortunate necessity, should it turn out to be so.

I wish to guard my opinion on one or two points.

I am not prepared to say that these obligations in favour of the subjects which belonged to Sir George Kinloch do not transmit with the land against singular successors to their full extent. A distinction has been drawn between the construction of the access and the subsequent upholding and maintenance of it when made. There are grounds for the distinction, but I reserve my opinion on it. But our judgment proceeds on the ground that whether a real burden has been constituted or not, there is at least a servitude well constituted, which necessarily transmits to singular successors, and this is sufficient for the decision of this case.

Farther, I say nothing as to the mutual relations of Brady and M'Kellar, or as to whether Brady has any ground subject to the obligation in question.

Lastly, the question of maintenance between the feuars, as well as with the improvement trustees, must be reserved entire.

With these explanations, I propose the following interlocutor—[reads draft of interlocutor given below]. That will apply solely to the ground contained in the disposition to the improvement trustees. If Brady has no ground included in the disposition it will not apply to him.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Having heard counsel on the reclaiming note for the defenders, the Edinburgh Improvement Trustees, against Lord Curriehill's interlocutor of 4th March 1876, Adhere to the said interlocutor, in so far as it is directed against the defenders, the improvement trustees: Find, further, that the defenders, John M'Kellar and Thomas Brady, are, in virtue of their feu-rights, bound to submit to a servitude of a cart and carriage access from the Grassmarket to the property of the pursuers, over so much of the ground included in their respective rights which abuts on the existing access as was acquired by their authors, the improvement trustees, from Sir George Kinloch by the disposition No. 8 of process, and that of the dimensions set out in the said interlocutor: But before farther answer on the remaining points of the case, including any question relative to the future maintenance of the entrance in question, appoint the defenders, the improvement trustees, to state in a minute what steps they are prepared to take in order to carry out this judgment: Find the defenders, the improvement trustees, liable in additional expenses, and remit to the Auditor to tax the same, and report: Reserve in the meantime all other questions of expenses."

KEEGAN & WELSH S.S.C.—J. KNOX CRAWFORD, S.S.C.—THOMAS SPALDING, W.S.—J. DUNCAN SMITH, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 168.

July 18, 1876.

Davie v. Stark.

JOHN DAVIE, Pursuer and Respondent.—Balfour—J. A. Reid.
WILLIAM C. STARK, Defender and Appellant.—Mackintosh—Laidlay.

Lease—Mutual Obligation—Compensation—Retention—Liquid and Illiquid—Rescission of Contract.—A shop was let for seven years to a clothier, with the condition that an adjoining shop, also belonging to the lessor, should not be let to a person in the same trade. Disputes having arisen in consequence of the landlord (a singular successor of the granter of the lease) selling in the adjoining shop articles which the tenant claimed to fall within his monopoly, the tenant, at the end of three years, after warning the landlord, threw up the lease, and quitted the premises.

In an action by the landlord for the rent of the half year after the tenant had left the premises the tenant produced a correspondence which shewed that there had been repeated complaints on his part of the landlord's selling articles usually sold by a clothier, and a persistent refusal on the part of the landlord to acknowledge any right on the part of the tenant to control his trade in the adjoining shop.

The Court allowed the defender a proof before answer, and upon the proof found that the defender had in fact suffered damage, in consequence of the pursuer's violation of the lease, to a greater extent than the sum sued for, and that he was entitled, without raising a separate action, to set off the damages due to him in extinction of the sum sued for.

Opinion (per Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Neaves, and Lord Gifford) that the landlord having not only violated a material condition of the lease, but intimated his intention of continuing to do so, the tenant was entitled to rescind the lease, and that consequently no rent was due for the period after he had quitted the shop.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Mid-Lothian and Haddington.

I.

THIS action was raised in November 1875 in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh by John Davie, proprietor of the shop No. 92 High Street, Edinburgh, against William Stark, clothier, who was tenant of the said shop, under a lease for seven years from Whitsunday 1872, at a rent of £100 per annum.

The summons concluded for payment of £50, being the rent due at Martinmas 1875 for the half year immediately preceding.

The defence was, that the missives of lease under which the defender possessed the shop, entered into in February 1872 between the defender and Messrs M'Kellar and Swan, who were then proprietors of the shop, contained a condition that the adjoining shop (No. 94 High Street), which belonged to the same proprietors, should not, during the defender's lease, be let to any person in the drapery, clothing, or ready-made clothing trade; that the pursuer purchased both shops, with entry at Whitsunday 1872, under burden of the defender's lease; that he entered upon the personal occupation of No. 94 at that date, and immediately began to expose for sale in that shop articles forming part of the ordinary stock of a draper, clothier, and ready-made outfitter; that notwithstanding repeated remonstrances on the part of the defender, the pursuer persisted in this violation of the lease, and expressly refused to recognise any right of interference in his trade on the part of the defender; that at last, on 23d April 1875, the defender, through his agent, wrote the pursuer that unless he discontinued, on or before 1st May 1875, infringing the terms of the lease, the defender would hold himself entitled to renounce the lease and vacate the premises, and he would do so at the term of Whitsunday 1875; that the pursuer's reply was, that, as he was not aware that he was infringing the terms of the lease, he declined to alter the conduct of his business; that in consequence of the pursuer's refusal to perform his part of the contract of lease the defender rescinded the lease at Whitsunday 1875, and vacated the premises.

No. 168.

July 18, 1876.

Davie v. Stark.

The defender's complaints and the pursuer's answers thereto were instructed by the production of the correspondence between the parties and their respective agents.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(5) In any case, the defender's claim being merely one of damage, and illiquid, the same cannot be set off or pleaded against the pursuer's claim for rent.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(2) If the missive letters between the defender and M'Kellar and Swan and their agents constitute a binding lease, the restriction therein contained not to let the shop No. 94 High Street to any person in the drapery, clothing, or ready-made outfitting trade, forms an integral part of that lease, and the pursuer, as landlord, cannot enforce implement of the defender's part of the lease while he declines to perform his own counterpart obligations. (3) The pursuer having refused to perform his obligations, after being repeatedly required so to do, and the defender having in consequence renounced the lease and ceded possession of the premises to the pursuer at Whitsunday 1875, is not liable in payment of the sum sued for.

The Sheriff-substitute (Hallard), on 16th February 1876, pronounced an interlocutor upon the closed record and productions, finding that the defender was not entitled, on the ground of the alleged violation of the lease by the pursuer, to put an end to the lease and abandon possession, and therefore that he was bound to pay the rent concluded for.*

The defender appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—The stipulation for a monopoly was a material condition of the lease. The pursuer having violated this condition, the defender was entitled either to rescind the contract or to claim damages.[1] The pursuer could not enforce payment of the rent, in respect that he had failed to give the defender what was stipulated in the lease.[2] Assuming that the defender could not now rescind the contract, he was entitled to have the damages liquidated in this action.[3] The correspondence in process was conclusive evidence of violation of the contract by the landlord, and of his declared intention to continue the violation. It only remained to ascertain the amount of the damages sustained by the tenant.

---

* The following note was appended to the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor:—"On the assumption that the defender's complaint was well founded, it is thought that the remedy adopted by him was not the competent one. He might have sought redress for the past by damages, and protection for the future by interdict. But his right to break the lease is not clear, and required at all events to be ascertained by declarator.

"At the very interesting debate with which the Sheriff-substitute was favoured, the pursuer relied on the case of Drybrough v. Drybrough, 21st May 1874. The defender justly pointed out the distinction between that case and the present. There the tenant remained in possession, and refused payment of his rent in respect of an unconstituted and illiquid claim for abatement of rent. Here the tenant ceased to possess. But it is thought that that authority applies here a fortiori. If the tenant remaining in possession is not entitled to oppose to a demand for rent an illiquid claim expressly contemplated in the lease, still less is he entitled at his own hand to break the lease, cease possession, and leave the premises without a tenant. A claim to abate rent is surely a smaller thing than a claim to void the lease. If decree of constitution be needed for the one, decree of declarator seems to be much more needed for the other."

[1] Turnbull v. M'Lean and Co., March 5, 1874, ante, vol. i. p. 730.

[2] Guthrie v. Shearer, Nov. 13, 1873, ante, vol. i. p. 181; Kilmarnock Gas-light Co. v. Smith, Nov. 9, 1872, 11 Macph. 58, 45 Scot. Jur. 43.

[3] M'Bride v. Hamilton, June 11, 1875, ante, vol. ii. p. 775; Johnston v. Robertson, March 1, 1861, 23 D. 646, 33 Scot. Jur. 335.

No. 168.

July 18, 1876. Davie v. Stark.

Argued for the pursuer;—The defender had mistaken his remedy. If his allegations were true, he ought to have raised an action of interdict and damages.[1] The present case was unlike that of Guthrie v. Shearer, where possession of the subject let was not given, and where the remedy of interdict was not available to the tenant. Here the defender was unquestionably put in possession of the subjects let, and all that was alleged was that the pursuer had violated an incidental stipulation by doing something in regard to another subject. The defender was bound to have the alleged violation judicially declared. He was not entitled to take the law into his own hands, and leave the premises without a tenant, which was the position taken up by him on record. No plea of retention on the ground of damages was stated on record; but even if it were, the case fell under the usual rule, that a demand for rent past due could not be met by an illiquid claim of damages.[2] None of the cases relied on by the defender in support of this part of his argument had reference to the contract of lease, and the cases in which the plea of retention had been refused were very numerous.[3] The general rule of retention applicable to mutual contracts had no application to cases between landlord and tenant, because the two obligations were not contemporaneous. The rent was payable at a fixed term, but the damages were not due till liquidated.[4]

In the course of the debate the defender craved leave to amend his record by adding the following averment:—"The defender has suffered loss and damage from the pursuer's breach of contract in the premises to an extent largely in excess of the sum sued for;" and relative plea in law:—"The defender having suffered loss, injury, and damage by the pursuer's breach of contract in the premises to an extent largely in excess of the sum sued for the pursuer is not entitled to insist in the action."

Lord Justice-Clerk.—The question of law in this case depends very much on the question of fact, and I think it unfortunate that the Sheriff-substitute did not adopt the course of allowing a proof before answer. If there was only an occasional sale of the articles complained of—if, in short, there was no substantial injury to Stark—I do not think that he would have a right to rescind the contract, or that the claim of damages at his instance could be maintained in answer to the demand for rent; but it may be otherwise if there was a deliberate violation of the lease by the landlord. Without indicating my opinion on this point, I propose to allow a proof before further answer.

Lord Neaves, Lord Ormidale, and Lord Gifford concurred.

This interlocutor was pronounced on 9th June 1876:—"Allow the amendment proposed by the defender to be made upon the record, and before answer allow to both parties a proof of their respective averments in the record, the defender to lead in the proof; and appoint the same to be taken by Lord Ormidale; . . . reserving all questions of expenses."

A proof was accordingly taken, which shewed that the pursuer carried on the trade of a hatter and bootmaker in No. 94, but that he also sold to

[1] Simson v. Crippin, Nov. 26, 1872, L. R. 8 Q. B. 14; Johannsohn v. Young, June 2, 1863, 32 L. J. Q. B. 385.

[2] Drybrough v. Drybrough, May 21, 1874, ante, vol. i. p. 909.

[3] See cases cited in Hunter on Landlord and Tenant, vol. ii. p. 264, &c.

[4] Per Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis in Johnston v. Robertson, March 1, 1861, 23 D. p. 656, 33 Scot. Jur. p. 340.

No. 168.
July 18, 1876.
Davie v. Stark.

a considerable extent minor articles, such as caps, ties, braces, &c., falling within the usual business of a clothier and outfitter, and therefore, as regards these articles, competed with the defender's trade. It appeared that the total prices of these articles sold by the pursuer between Whitsunday 1872 and Whitsunday 1875 was about £100; but it was not easy to estimate precisely the amount of injury to the defender's business caused by such sales.

The debate was resumed.

After hearing junior counsel on the proof the Court intimated their opinion that the amount of damage suffered by the defender in consequence of the pursuer's contravention of the lease was sufficient to entitle him to raise the legal question involved, and directed senior counsel to confine their argument to the point of law.

For the defender the argument was repeated—(1) that the circumstances justified rescission of the contract, which necessarily extinguished all claims for rent for the period after Whitsunday 1875; and (2) that in any view the pursuer could not recover the half year's rent sued for, in respect that the proof shewed that he was due to the defender a larger sum by way of damages.

Argued for the pursuer;—There were two questions in the case—(1) whether anything had occurred to entitle the tenant to rescind the lease; and (2) whether, if he was not entitled to rescind the lease, he was entitled to extinguish the rent by setting off damages against it. As to the first point, so far as the pursuer was a lessor he had fulfilled the contract of lease. The breach he had committed was of a collateral obligation, and looking to the doubt which had existed whether there had been any violation of the contract, and to the comparatively trifling character of that violation, this was not a case which justified rescission of the lease by the tenant. He was no more entitled to take this step than the tenant of an agricultural farm who had suffered some damage from game. In all such cases, where the breach was not of the essence of the contract, the remedy of the party aggrieved was to claim damages, and protect himself for the future by interdict. The new defence stated was equally untenable. To hold that while the lease existed the defender was nevertheless entitled to extinguish the rent by a claim of damages, the amount of which was not even now stated, would lead to this result, that the pursuer would have to bring seven more actions for each half year's rent as it fell due, in each of which actions he would, for all that appeared, be met by the defence that the damage still due to the defender was in excess of the sum sued for. Such would be the consequences of abandoning the well established rule that a tenant must constitute a claim of damages before he could set it off against a claim for rent past due.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is an action at the instance of Mr Davie, proprietor by purchase of a shop in the High Street of Edinburgh, against Mr Stark, tenant of the shop under a lease for seven years from Whitsunday 1872, and concludes for a half year's rent due at Martinmas 1875. The defence is substantially, admitting that the defender was in possession of the subjects down to Whitsunday 1875 under missives constituting a lease for seven years from Whitsunday 1872, that there was a condition contained in these missives of lease which has not been implemented by the pursuer, and which he has refused to implement, that in consequence the defender was entitled to rescind the contract of lease, and that he has rescinded it. Further, the defender says that even if he is not entitled to rescind the contract, he has suffered damages by the pursuer's refusal to implement the stipulation in question, which damages he is at all events entitled to set off against the rent claimed.

No. 168.

July 18, 1876. Davie v. Stark.

The Sheriff-substitute has found that the defender was not entitled to put an end to the lease, and has decerned in terms of the conclusions of the summons. I have come to the conclusion that the defender was entitled to rescind the contract, because there was a substantial violation by the pursuer of one of the fundamental conditions of the lease; and in the second place, as the case now stands, and with all the facts before us, I am of opinion that in any view the defender would be entitled to set off the damages which he has suffered by the pursuer's breach of contract against the rent which is now claimed. But I propose to put my judgment entirely upon the first ground, viz. that the pursuer has not only failed to fulfil, but refused to fulfil a substantial and material part of the contract of lease, and that therefore the defender is entitled, without seeking to enforce implement of the stipulation in question, to throw up the position of tenant.

The terms of the lease are contained in certain letters which passed between Mr Stark and Mr Davie's authors, Messrs M'Kellar and Swan, or their agent. On 5th February Mr Stark writes to M'Kellar and Swan as follows:—"I offer to take that new shop No. , lowmost shop, High Street, with cellarage below, for a period of seven years, at the yearly rental of one hundred pounds sterling, on conditions that it is fitted up with gas-fittings according to my instructions, —that the two shops above, No. and High Street, are not let during the term of my lease to any person or persons in the drapery, clothing, or ready-made outfitting trade." On 6th February 1872 the agent for M'Kellar and Swan replies that his clients "are willing to consent to the restriction you propose as to the shop next to the one you offer for, but they cannot consent to any restriction as to the uppermost of two shops above, to which you refer." On 7th February Mr Stark writes—"In reply to yours of the 6th, I agree to find security for the rent, on the condition that all the gas-rods are fitted up wholly and entirely at the expense of the landlord; that the shop next to the one I offer for be subject to the restrictions referred to in my last letter." This offer is accepted by M'Kellar and Swan by letter dated 12th February 1872.

I have no doubt that it was a material, and even an essential part of the contract of lease that this other shop referred to should not be let to any person "in the drapery, clothing, or ready-made outfitting trade." The landlord was as much bound to fulfil that part of the contract as the tenant was to pay rent.

On 29th May 1872 we find Mr Davie's agent writing to Mr Stark's agents—"My client was not aware that Mr Stark possessed the premises occupied by him under a lease, as he was applied to the other day to give his consent as purchaser of the premises to a lease in your client's favour containing some absurd provisions as to what your client was to sell, or rather not to sell, and which he declined to have anything to do with." Some correspondence follows, the result of which is that Davie positively refuses to be controlled in any way in the use of the adjoining shop.

So the matter ends till 1875. Davie not only takes the position that he is not bound by the stipulation in regard to the adjoining shop, but does not admit that Stark is other than a yearly tenant, and gives him distinct notice that he does not intend to fulfil the stipulation. Accordingly, on 1st February 1875 Stark takes Davie at his word, and intimates that he will cease to occupy the shop occupied by him after Whitsunday 1875. Some further correspondence takes place, and on 23d April 1875 Mr Stark's agents write to Mr Davie's agent

—"We now beg formally to intimate to you, as acting for Mr Davie, that unless he discontinues, on or before the 1st May 1875, infringing the terms of Mr Stark's lease, as already complained of, Mr Stark will hold himself entitled to renounce the lease in question, and vacate the premises, and he will do so at the term of Whitsunday first." Mr Davie's agent replies on 27th April—"As my client is not aware that he is infringing the terms of the lease, he declines to alter the conduct of his business."

The first question is, whether there was a violation of the contract by the pursuer. The stipulation in regard to the adjoining shop was an important condition, to secure the defender in a certain monopoly of trade. It has been ingeniously argued that the monopoly was part of the subjects let. I do not look upon it in that view, but undoubtedly it was a material condition of the contract. We have had a proof as to the extent to which this condition was violated, and here it is that my only difficulty arises. I think that the condition was violated to an appreciable, though not very great extent, but it certainly was deliberately violated in regard to some of the articles sold. The pursuer cannot defend his conduct by saying that the occupation of a hatter implies the sale of these articles. There are many things the sale of which is generally included under the nominal business of a hatter, but which the pursuer was not entitled to sell, because they fell within the defender's line of business as a clothier, which it was the object of this agreement to protect.

The next question is, what is the result of this violation. I entirely adhere to the views expressed in Turnbull v. M'Lean and Co. (March 5, 1874), that failure to perform any material part of a mutual contract by one of the parties will prevent him from insisting on implement against the other. The authorities on the subject were all gone into in that case, and I need not repeat them. The other party is entitled either to refuse implement until the stipulations in his favour have been fulfilled, or, provided that the latter are material and essential, to rescind the contract altogether. Rescission, no doubt, is a strong measure, and is only competent where the stipulations violated are material or essential. The breach of minor and incidental stipulations, although it may be a ground for damages, will not justify rescission of the contract. A good illustration is to be found in the present contract in regard to the stipulation about gas-fittings. A failure by the landlord in regard to this would not have entitled the tenant to rescind the contract. But the violation with which we have to do is of a totally different kind. It is not only that the landlord has violated the contract in the past, but he intimates his intention of violating it for the future, which is, indeed, equivalent to a rescinding of the contract on his part. In such a case I cannot doubt the right of the tenant to rescind the contract, and therefore that he is not liable for the rent sued for.

In regard to damages, I should be inclined to hold, upon the concluded proof, that there is nothing in the fact of the damages being illiquid which would prevent us from doing substantial justice between the parties.

LORD NEAVES.—I take the same view of the rights of parties as your Lordship. I think that in the circumstances of the case Stark was entitled to rescind the lease. He did not do it rashly, or take advantage of an accidental violation of the lease, in order to get quit of an unprofitable bargain. He called upon the landlord to desist from the violation of the lease, and that was refused.

Perhaps we are not put to the absolute necessity of determining whether

No. 168. July 18, 1876. Davie v. Stark.

Stark had a right to rescind, seeing that this is not a declarator at the instance of Stark, but a defence to an action at the instance of the landlord for a half year's rent. In answer to that demand, I think Stark entitled to prove the extent of damage suffered by him, and to set it off against the landlord's claim for rent. I think him entitled to have the damages liquidated in the present action, and, if these amount to £50, to have the landlord's claim extinguished, which it would plainly be, to the extent of the only sum concluded for. While I am willing to dispose of the case in this way, I am prepared, as I said, to go further, if thought advisable, and affirm the defender's right to rescind the lease, in respect of the landlord's resolute refusal to recognise any right of control or interference on the part of the defender as to the business carried on in the adjoining shop.

LORD ORMIDALE.—There are three questions which require to be considered and disposed of in this case:—First, was there a violation by the pursuer, the landlord, of a material condition of the lease; secondly, if there was such a violation, resulting in damages to the defender, the tenant, is he entitled to an abatement from the rent sued for, or rather to have it extinguished; and, thirdly, is he not only entitled to that, but also was he entitled to desert the premises, as he did at Whitsunday 1875, and to have the lease held as rescinded as of that date.

These, with the exception perhaps of the first, are important questions, and attended with some nicety as well as difficulty.

In regard to the first question, it is not suggested that there was any illegality in the condition that the landlord should not let the shop adjoining Mr Stark's, during his lease of seven years to any person in the drapery, clothing, or ready-made outfitting trade, nor is it disputed that this condition was binding on Mr Davie, although a singular successor. (His Lordship then examined the evidence upon the extent to which the condition was violated, and proceeded)—I have come to the result that the extent of the encroachment was not only appreciable, but considerable, with reference to the rent sued for. Without specifying in exact figures the amount of damages, it is sufficient for the purposes of this action to say that, in my opinion, they must have amounted to at least the £50 claimed by the pursuer.

This being so, we come to the other two questions, or, in other words, to consider what is Mr Stark's, the tenant's, remedy or redress.

We see that from the first there were complaints on the part of Stark of Davie selling articles in the adjoining shop contrary to the terms of the lease, and at last that Stark's agents wrote a letter, distinctly intimating and reserving his claim of damages. The violation nevertheless went on. In 1875 the correspondence is resumed. In his letter of 1st February Stark takes up the position of being a yearly tenant, which he certainly was not, although it is a position which the landlord seems at one time to have taken up himself. Afterwards, however, Stark is better advised, and on 23d April his agents write as follows:—(Reads letter of April 23, 1875).[1] This letter, however, was within, it will be observed, only about a month prior to the Whitsunday term, and was scarcely timeous notice to the landlord to look out for a new tenant. This leads me to think that the tenant's true remedy was to claim abatement of rent in respect of the damage he had sustained, and not a rescission of the lease. As to his right to [1] Referred to on p. 1114.

No. 168.

July 18, 1876.
Davie v. Stark.

claim abatement I have very little doubt, although there are several cases in the books in which a tenant has been held not entitled to abatement of rent until he had liquidated his damages. These cases are not very easy to reconcile with others in which abatement has been allowed. Perhaps they might be reconciled by a consideration of the nature and amount of the claim of damages in the different cases. I may, however, advert to the case of Campbell v. Watt, June 18, 1795, Hume, p. 788, as closely analogous to the present, in which an abatement from the rent of an inn was allowed in defence to the landlord's claim of rent, because the landlord had erected another inn at a short distance, contrary to what was held to be the implied condition of the tenant's lease. That case is very much in point as a precedent for the present. Indeed the present case is a fortiori of that of Campbell v. Watt, because here there was an express condition that the landlord should not set up another shop of the same kind in the adjoining premises, whereas in Campbell v. Watt such a condition was only implied. Therefore, what I desire to rest my judgment upon is this, that the tenant here is entitled to say that the rent sued for is extinguished by his counter claim of damages. It would be very unfortunate if, after a long proof on the extent of damages, the tenant were obliged to bring a new action to liquidate the amount. This was not held necessary in the case of Campbell v. Watt, and I do not think it is necessary here.

Neither do I think it necessary to determine whether the tenant had a right to rescind the lease. I should have had great hesitation in coming to the conclusion that it was competent for a tenant under a seven years' lease, with four more years to run, to throw it up in the circumstances which have here occurred. I think the argument for the pursuer against his right to do so has not been answered, especially as no instance has been adduced in which a tenant, who had the remedy of interdict open to him and did not use it, was found entitled to rescind. In Guthrie v. Shearer (Nov. 13, 1873, ante, vol. i. p. 181) it was held that the tenant of a quarry was entitled to rescind the lease because he did not get possession of a road stipulated for in the lease and indispensable to the working of the quarry. But in that case the remedy of interdict was not available. The tenant could not by way of interdict obtain the road to which he was entitled. I do not therefore think that case in point.

Without saying that under no circumstances would a tenant be entitled to rescind his lease, I am not satisfied that he was entitled to resort to that extreme measure of redress in the present case. Nor is it necessary so to determine, for it is enough to entitle the defender to absolvitor that the damages due to him by the landlord for breach of the contract of lease are at least equal to the rent sued for.

LORD GIFFORD.—Although the amount of the pecuniary or patrimonial interest involved in this case is comparatively small, the case itself raises questions of some delicacy, and of great importance in the law of mutual contract.

The appellant, Mr Stark, was lessee of a shop No. 92 High Street, Edinburgh, under missives dated in February 1872, and that for the term of seven years from and after Whitsunday 1872, at the yearly rent of £100. The missives were entered into between the appellant as tenant, and M'Kellar and Swan, who were then proprietors, and the missives were followed by possession. Accordingly it is not now matter of dispute that a valid and effectual contract of lease was entered into for seven years, and although the present respondent, Mr Davie, is a singular successor of the original lessors, it is not now contested, and indeed could not well be, that he is bound by the missives of lease granted by his authors, and clothed with possession. It is true that in the correspondence both parties—first Mr Davie, and then Mr Stark—took an opposite view, that the lease was only valid from year to year; but this is now given up, and rightly given up, by both parties, and the validity of the seven years' lease is no longer disputed. But, whether disputed or not, I think there is no doubt whatever that a lease for seven years was validly constituted and subsisting, at least until the dispute arose which led to the present proceedings.

No. 168.

July 18, 1876.
Davie v. Stark.

It was a condition of the lease, and in my view a very material and important condition, that the shop let to the appellant should have secured to it what has been called a locally limited monopoly, to this extent, that the adjoining shop, which belonged to the same proprietors, should not be occupied for the purposes of the same trade as that carried on by the appellant. The words of this condition in the missives are peculiar. They are as follows:—"On condition that the two shops above" (afterwards restricted to the shop immediately above) "are not let during the term of my lease to any person or persons in the drapery, clothing, or ready-made outfitting trade."

I am of opinion that this condition and stipulation was one which might legally and competently be made—that it was binding upon the contracting parties and on the singular successors of the lessors as an integral part of the appellant's lease; and the first question which arises is, has this condition and stipulation of the lease been observed by the respondent, who is proprietor of both shops—that is, both of the shop let to the appellant and of the shop immediately above it; and upon this point a long and somewhat elaborate proof has been led under a previous order of Court.

I am of opinion that it has been sufficiently proved that the respondent, from the commencement of the lease down to and subsequent to Whitsunday 1875, has violated and contravened this stipulation in the lease, inasmuch as the respondent during that period has used and occupied the shop immediately above the appellant's shop for the sale of articles in "the drapery, clothing, or ready-made outfitting trade." It was originally contended that as the stipulation only was that the shop adjoining the appellant's should not be "let" for such a trade, this would not prevent the respondent from so occupying the shop himself. This view, however, which was obviously against the good faith of the contract, was at once disclaimed and abandoned at the bar. It is perfectly obvious that the meaning of the agreement was to prohibit a particular trade in the adjoining shop, whether that trade should be carried on by a tenant or by the landlord himself.

As to the extent of the violation or contravention of the condition, it is true upon the proof that the contravention only went to a certain extent. The respondent did not carry on in the shop adjoining that of the appellant exactly the same trade as that carried on by the appellant. The appellant was a draper, clothier, and outfitter; the respondent was a hatter and bootmaker. But then it is abundantly proved that a great many articles which form a part of the appellant's trade as clothier and outfitter were also sold by the respondent, although he was nominally a hatter. For example, although there was not much objection to the hats, cloth caps were sold by the respondent to a very large extent—ties, mufflers, scarfs, braces, woollen shirts, collars, socks, stockings, and other such articles, were all found in the respondent's shop, although many of these formed staple articles in the appellant's trade. I cannot doubt that all this was a contravention of the condition, and in my view it is a most important point. It was a contravention deliberately and resolutely insisted in by the respondent. He absolutely refused to modify his trade in any way. It may also be conceded that the amount of sales effected by the respondent in what I may call contraband articles is not very great, looking to the considerable period of time which elapsed. Still I think the sales were material, and the contravention was not a trifle which it can possibly be said the law will not consider. The extent of goods sold or turned over by the respondent is not the measure of the appellant's loss or prejudice. He had a competitor next door, when his landlord had expressly guaranteed him against such competition. He may have had, as suggested in the proof, to lower prices, to press sales, and to submit to the annoyance of seeing possible customers seduced by his neighbour's window and his neighbour's display. And then the appellant could never tell to what extent the rivalry and competition might go—what sacrifices it might involve, and what classes or consignments of goods it might make useless. And so, upon the proof, and without going into details, which are minute and varied, I am prepared to hold that the respondent is chargeable with a gross and persistent violation of the stipulation in the lease, and that to a material and unjustifiable extent persisted in for three years, and this persistence is an all-important attribute of the contravention.

No. 168.

July 18, 1876.
Davie v. Stark.

At last Stark puts himself in a very good position. On 23d April 1875 his agents inform Mr Davie that unless he discontinues on or before 1st May infringing the terms of the lease Mr Stark would hold himself entitled to renounce the lease and vacate the premises at Whitsunday. Now, this was perhaps a little late. Still it was the right ground to take. If the answer had been that Mr Davie regretted that there had been a breach of the lease on his part, and that the objectionable articles would be at once removed from his shop, Stark would have been obliged to continue the lease. But what is the answer of the pursuer's agent?—"As my client is not aware that he is infringing the terms of the lease he declines to alter the conduct of his business." Defiance is thus thrown down. I cannot doubt the defender's right to renounce the lease after he got this answer. I do not think he was bound to resort to interdict—a possible but a troublesome remedy. The remedy of rescission of the contract was fairly open to him. It would be impossible to hold, for instance, that where a proprietor had let a hotel, guaranteeing that there should be no other hotel within a certain distance, if he were to proceed to build another within the distance stipulated, he could oblige the tenant to continue in possession, leaving the tenant to claim damages. The general rule of law is that if one party to a mutual contract will not fulfil a material condition of the contract, the other party is entitled to rescind the contract. Although, as has been observed, there are very few cases in the books in which this doctrine has been applied to the contract of lease, the reason is that a material condition of the lease is seldom violated by the landlord except where he does not give possession of the subjects let, and there are cases falling under this head. Suppose that a right of access to the subjects let were guaranteed by the landlord, could it be doubted that if this access were shut up, especially if it were shut up by the landlord himself, the tenant would be entitled to rescind?

I am therefore of opinion that the tenant was entitled to rescind the lease. I conveyance of the fee to him and the heirs of his body did not take effect, and that his disposition of April 1833 in favour of his mother and her heirs is inoperative; 3d, That on the death of Mrs Ralston (the last liferentrix) in 1872, the conveyance of the fee to Alexander Drummond, the testator's nephew (son of his brother, Robert Drummond), and his heirs, took effect, and that the said fee can now be claimed only under or through the medium of that conveyance: Allows both parties to propose such amendments of the record with reference to these findings as they may judge proper: Grants leave to either party to reclaim." *

No. 169. July 19, 1876. M'Lay v. Borland.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The fair presumption was that Gordon Drummond was dead in 1833 when John executed his deed, or at all events previous to John's death in 1858. But if Gordon was dead, John was fiar. The fee could not be in pendente, and it could be in no one else. The words "whom failing by predecease" meant by predeceasing the testator.

The defenders argued;—There was no proof that Gordon was dead even in 1858, and he might have left children. Even if he were dead without issue, John never was fiar. He was only to become fiar if he did not predecease the liferenters. Till the end of their liferent they were themselves fiduciary fiars.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The pursuers of this action claim right as heirs-portioners of their mother to a piece of land which was settled by the testamentary disposition of the late Alexander Drummond, of date 9th September 1816, and they claim that property on the footing that the testator's son, Gordon Drummond, who was first called in the destination, predeceased his father without issue, and, farther, that John Drummond acquired a vested right to the fee of the property and disponed it to his mother, of whom the pursuers are heirs-portioners. On the other hand, it is maintained by the defenders that there is no proof or presumption that Gordon Drummond predeceased his father; and even if he did, that according to the true construction of the settlement John, having predeceased certain liferenters, took no vested fee.

The question therefore turns on the consideration of (1) whether Gordon Drummond must be presumed to have predeceased his father, and if there is no such presumption, then at what period he must be presumed to have died—for that he is dead now is admitted; and (2) whether on construction of the settlement John Drummond ever took a vested right of fee.

The Lord Ordinary has found, "1st, That the testator's son, Gordon Drummond, predeceased his father, the testator, without issue, and that on this footing the property in the record referred to was possessed under the liferent

* "NOTE.— . . . The record takes no notice of Alexander Drummond and his heirs, and I am without information respecting them. If Alexander was legitimate, of which no doubt the Crown has information, the Crown advisers are probably right in concluding that the parties to the case, or some of them, would take preferably to the Crown as his heirs; and the Crown officers are certainly not bound to lend their aid to ascertain the state of the right under a conveyance, which—although, in my opinion, the governing conveyance—both parties in this case ignore. If the Court shall think that my view of the law is erroneous, the case may be decided on the record as it stands; but if it is the right view, it will be necessary to ascertain in some way whether Alexander Drummond is in life, and if not, who is now in his right as heir-at-law or otherwise. The conveyance to him and his heirs constitutes a fee-simple, and if it came into operation, as I think it did, it must govern the right to the property."

No. 169.

July 19, 1876.
M'Lay v. Borland.

daughters, in liferent, for their joint and pro indiviso liferent right and use, and to the survivor of them, in liferent, and after the decease of the survivor of them, to John Drummond, my grandson, son of my daughter, Margaret Drummond, and the heirs of his body, whom failing, by predecease without lawful issue, to Alexander Drummond, my nephew, son of my brother, Robert Drummond, and his heirs in fee."

Gordon Drummond had run away to sea in 1799 when thirteen years of age. He wrote two letters to his father during the next twelve months. About two years afterwards information was received by his father that he had been drowned, and he was never heard of again.

The testator was survived by his three daughters, of whom Margaret (Mrs Halley) died in 1858 leaving issue, Janet in 1867 without issue, and Agnes (Mrs Ralston) in 1872 leaving issue, and by John Drummond abovementioned, who was an illegitimate son of Margaret. The daughters entered into possession of his heritage, and their possession continued till the death of the last survivor, Mrs Ralston.

In 1833 John Drummond executed an onerous disposition of the subjects in Lauriston Street in favour of his mother, Mrs Halley, and her heirs. He died without issue in 1858.

After Mrs Ralston's death in 1872 her children took possession. But Mrs M'Lay and others, Mrs Halley's children, raised this action against them, concluding for declarator that the pursuers were proprietors.

They pleaded;—(1) The now deceased John Drummond, in terms of the disposition and settlement of Alexander Drummond, dated 9th September 1816, succeeded to the fee of the subjects mentioned in the conclusions of the summons upon the death of the disponer, and in consequence of the failure of the institute first called, and the heirs of his body, who had predeceased. (2) The right to the fee of the said subjects was effectually conveyed to Mrs Margaret Drummond or Halley by disposition by the said John Drummond in her favour, dated 5th April 1833.

The defenders pleaded;—(3) There being no proof or presumption that Gordon Drummond predeceased his father, John Drummond had never any right in the subjects, and could not convey any to his mother. (4) Farther, and separatim, John Drummond having predeceased the daughters of Alexander Drummond, no right ever vested in him, even assuming the existence of the alleged disposition and settlement and the predecease of Gordon Drummond without lawful issue. (5) The presumption being that Gordon Drummond is now dead, the defenders and pursuers are entitled to succeed to said subjects, partly in their own right and partly in that of their deceased aunt, as heirs of the said Alexander Drummond or as heirs of the said Gordon Drummond.

A proof was led. Neither the record nor the proof contained any information about Alexander Drummond, nephew of the testator, and neither party founded upon the conveyance to him.

The Lord Ordinary, after ordering intimation to the Queen's Remembrancer, who lodged a minute declining to appear, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds—1st, That the testator's son, Gordon Drummond, predeceased his father, the testator, without issue, and that on this footing the property in the record referred to was possessed under the liferent destination of the testator's settlement from the testator's death in 1823 till the death of Mrs Ralston, the last survivor of the liferentrices, in 1872; 2d, That John Drummond, the testator's grandson, being an illegitimate son of the testator's daughter, Mrs Margaret Drummond or Halley, died in January 1858, without lawful issue, and that having thus predeceased without lawful issue the last survivor of the liferentrices the conveyance of the fee to him and the heirs of his body did not take effect, and that his disposition of April 1833 in favour of his mother and her heirs is inoperative; 3d, That on the death of Mrs Ralston (the last liferentrix) in 1872, the conveyance of the fee to Alexander Drummond, the testator's nephew (son of his brother, Robert Drummond), and his heirs, took effect, and that the said fee can now be claimed only under or through the medium of that conveyance: Allows both parties to propose such amendments of the record with reference to these findings as they may judge proper: Grants leave to either party to reclaim." *

No. 169. July 19, 1876. M'Lay v. Borland.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The fair presumption was that Gordon Drummond was dead in 1833 when John executed his deed, or at all events previous to John's death in 1858. But if Gordon was dead, John was fiar. The fee could not be in pendente, and it could be in no one else. The words "whom failing by predecease" meant by predeceasing the testator.

The defenders argued;—There was no proof that Gordon was dead even in 1858, and he might have left children. Even if he were dead without issue, John never was fiar. He was only to become fiar if he did not predecease the liferenters. Till the end of their liferent they were themselves fiduciary fiars.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The pursuers of this action claim right as heirs-portioners of their mother to a piece of land which was settled by the testamentary disposition of the late Alexander Drummond, of date 9th September 1816, and they claim that property on the footing that the testator's son, Gordon Drummond, who was first called in the destination, predeceased his father without issue, and, farther, that John Drummond acquired a vested right to the fee of the property and disponed it to his mother, of whom the pursuers are heirs-portioners. On the other hand, it is maintained by the defenders that there is no proof or presumption that Gordon Drummond predeceased his father; and even if he did, that according to the true construction of the settlement John, having predeceased certain liferenters, took no vested fee.

The question therefore turns on the consideration of (1) whether Gordon Drummond must be presumed to have predeceased his father, and if there is no such presumption, then at what period he must be presumed to have died—for that he is dead now is admitted; and (2) whether on construction of the settlement John Drummond ever took a vested right of fee.

The Lord Ordinary has found, "1st, That the testator's son, Gordon Drummond, predeceased his father, the testator, without issue, and that on this footing the property in the record referred to was possessed under the liferent destination of the testator's settlement from the testator's death in 1823 till the death of Mrs Ralston, the last survivor of the liferentrices, in 1872; 2d, That John Drummond, the testator's grandson, being an illegitimate son of the testator's daughter, Mrs Margaret Drummond or Halley, died in January 1858 without lawful issue, and that having thus predeceased without lawful issue the last survivor of the liferentrices the conveyance of the fee to him and the heirs of his body did not take effect, and that his disposition of April 1833 in favour of his mother and her heirs is inoperative; 3d, That on the death of Mrs Ralston (the last liferentrix) in 1872, the conveyance of the fee to Alexander Drummond, the testator's nephew (son of his brother, Robert Drummond), and his heirs, took effect, and that the said fee can now be claimed only under or through the medium of that conveyance," with what purpose I do not understand, because it appears to me that his findings lead to the legitimate and logical conclusion that the pursuers have failed, and so the defenders are entitled to judgment of absolvitor.

* "NOTE.— . . . The record takes no notice of Alexander Drummond and his heirs, and I am without information respecting them. If Alexander was legitimate, of which no doubt the Crown has information, the Crown advisers are probably right in concluding that the parties to the case, or some of them, would take preferably to the Crown as his heirs; and the Crown officers are certainly not bound to lend their aid to ascertain the state of the right under a conveyance, which—although, in my opinion, the governing conveyance—both parties in this case ignore. If the Court shall think that my view of the law is erroneous, the case may be decided on the record as it stands; but if it is the right view, it will be necessary to ascertain in some way whether Alexander Drummond is in life, and if not, who is now in his right as heir-at-law or otherwise. The conveyance to him and his heirs constitutes a fee-simple, and if it came into operation, as I think it did, it must govern the right to the property."

According to the view I take of the settlement of Alexander Drummond in 1816 I am not very much concerned to fix the date of Gordon Drummond's dying, as seeing the time which has elapsed no one disputes his being dead now.

I therefore pass that by in the meantime to call attention to the terms of Alexander Drummond's settlement. At that time his son was abroad, and had been so for some time, and that accounts for the way in which the first member of the destination is expressed—"To and in favour of my son, Gordon Drummond, presently abroad, if in life, and the lawful heirs of his body, heritably and irredeemably; whom failing, to Margaret Drummond, Janet Drummond, and Agnes Drummond, my daughters, in liferent, for their joint and pro indiviso liferent right and use, and to the survivor of them in liferent."

Failing Gordon Drummond and heirs of his body there is no doubt, so far, that these three ladies take in liferent. It is not contended that they took a fee. If that were so the difficulty would be solved, but I am of opinion that, looking to the other clauses of the deed, it is not possible to consider them as more than liferenters allenarly. If, then, Gordon Drummond failed, the liferent went to these ladies; but where was the fee? The words following are these—"And after the decease of the survivor of them, to John Drummond, my grandson, son of my daughter, Margaret Drummond, and the heirs of his body."

These words, if taken alone, would give a fee to John Drummond, for it might very reasonably be contended that the right of John Drummond so postponed to the right of the liferenters was not the right of fee, but only the right of beneficial enjoyment, he being still fiar; but then other words follow—"Whom failing by predecease without lawful issue, to Alexander Drummond, my nephew, son of my brother, Robert Drummond, and his heirs in fee."

"Whom failing" applies to John Drummond, and his failure, which opens the succession, is failure by predecease, and the question is, what is meant by predecease within the meaning of this settlement. It is contended for the pursuers that predecease here means predecease of the testator. I think that is not admissible, because John Drummond's failure is a condition on the purification of which only the estates go to Alexander Drummond, the nephew. Now, surely Alexander Drummond is not a mere conditional institute, and in no circumstances a substitute, and yet that would be the consequence if predecease here meant predecease of the testator. If that interpretation be excluded as unreasonable the only alternative left is that predecease means predecease of the

No. 169.
July 19, 1876.
M'Lay v. Borland.

liferenters; and taking it with the words preceding, which introduce John Drummond for the first time, I confess that the only reading that seems at all reasonable to me is that John Drummond was not to take the fee unless he survived the liferenters or left issue to do so.

If that be so then John Drummond's deed made during the lifetime of the liferenters was of no effect. He predeceased them without issue, and accordingly the estate went to Alexander, the nephew, and his heirs.

As far as intention goes this is a fair and legitimate construction of the testator's deed. But we must now attend to the legal difficulty, which seems to be to satisfy the maxim that a fee cannot be in pendente. If Gordon Drummond died without heirs, and the liferenters took up the estate, where was the fee? One view is that it was in John Drummond. That is maintained by the pursuers, but, for the reasons I have given, I do not think that admissible. I confess I have had no satisfactory solution of this difficulty from the defenders, but I think it can be got over in this way. Gordon Drummond and John Drummond were both conditional fiars on the face of the deed. Gordon Drummond was to take if in life—a matter of doubt—and, accordingly, if he be not alive another destination is provided. But if the fact of Gordon Drummond being alive never appears, then the condition is purified. I do not think, however, that till that be made certain the fee should remain in suspense, and so putting Gordon Drummond out of the question I find the necessity of vesting the fee in some one. If John Drummond holds it he will only hold it conditionally, subject to defeasance. Now, if this is necessarily a fee held under a resolutive condition, is it not possible that it should be held under two resolutive conditions? I think it vested in Alexander Drummond, the nephew, under two resolutive conditions, one depending on the life of Gordon Drummond, the other depending on John Drummond or his issue surviving the liferenters. The condition under which John Drummond takes is a suspensive condition, but Alexander Drummond's right is under resolutive conditions only, and so they do not prevent him from holding it in the meantime. As in the case of the emergence of a nearer heir, so Alexander Drummond takes under the condition that he gives up the estate if Gordon Drummond appears, and, further, if John Drummond survives the liferenters; but neither of these events having occurred, Alexander is absolute fiar, and the pursuers fail in their contention.

It will now be apparent why I attach so little consequence to when Gordon Drummond died.

I am therefore for adhering to the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, but on different grounds.

Lord Deas.—I agree with your Lordship in the chair in thinking that we must hold that Gordon Drummond died before any of the events which could affect this case.

When the last account was heard of him he was in friendly and affectionate correspondence with his father. That correspondence suddenly ceased on his part, and no reason has been suggested why it should have done so except the accuracy of the news which ultimately reached his father that he had been drowned. The cessation of the friendly and constant correspondence between the father and son is very important in considering the question how long a period requires to have elapsed before the absentee is to be presumed to be dead. That is a question of circumstances in each case,—for the law is really now reduced to that. I believe that Gordon Drummond was drowned very soon after his correspondence with his father ceased—certainly long before any date which affects the result of this case.

No. 169.
July 19, 1876.
M'Lay v. Borland.

The deed of John Drummond is dated in 1833, and Gordon Drummond was no doubt dead before that date. John Drummond himself did not die till 1858, and it is, if possible, still clearer that Gordon Drummond was dead before that date.

This being so, I now come to the construction of this deed. With deference to your Lordship in the chair I have no doubt that the granter's intention was that, failing Gordon Drummond, the property should be liferented by the three ladies; that they had no more than a liferent is very clear, and consequently some one else must have been all along the fiar. The Lord Ordinary's observations appear to me to lead necessarily to there having been a period when the fee was in pendente, which cannot be listened to. There must always have been a fiar. The question then is, failing Gordon Drummond, who was that fiar? I think the fiar in the lifetime of the liferenters was John Drummond, the grandson. The property is disponed to him, whom failing, to Alexander Drummond. That I take to be the order of fiars under this deed. The time when the beneficial enjoyment emerged has nothing to do with the feudal question of the fee. The words "after the decease of the survivor of them" (the liferenters) refer, in my opinion, only to the beneficial enjoyment and not to the feudal fee, the vesting of which could not be postponed. That view satisfies these words, and the destination of the fee is "to John Drummond, my grandson, ... whom failing, by predecease without issue, to Alexander Drummond." It would be a new use of the words "whom failing," if they were to bring in the person who is to be made way for by the failure before the person who is to fail. The only consistent way is to read the deed as giving the fee to John, whom failing, to Alexander, subject to the condition that the beneficial enjoyment is postponed till the death of the last of the liferenters. That meaning gets clearer as the deed goes on to provide "that my said grandson, John Drummond, and nephew, Alexander Drummond, if they shall succeed to the foresaid property, shall be bound and obliged" to pay £80 to the children of Agnes—that is, on the failure of Gordon Drummond. If Gordon fails then John comes in as fiar, and Alexander after him. The words of the obligation to infeft point distinctly to the same conclusion,—"to infeft and seize the said Gordon Drummond, my son, and his heirs, whom failing, my said daughters in liferent, and the other persons before mentioned in fee." These other persons are—1st, John, and then Alexander and his heirs. I have no doubt that that was the intention—the grandson being nearer than the nephew.

The Lord Ordinary suggests nothing to get over the fee being (according to his view) in pendente. Your Lordship in the chair finds it necessary to get over that difficulty by a suggestion which I think contrary to the plain meaning of the granter. That suggestion I understand to be that the fee was all along in Alexander, who is named last and conditionally. But why reverse the plain order? The view I take is, I think, in accordance both with the law and the intention.

LORD MURE.—The construction of this deed is not free from difficulty. But I concur with your Lordship in the chair, and with the Lord Ordinary, in thinking that the intention of the clause in question, having regard to the words

No. 169.

July 19, 1876.
M'Lay v. Borland.

"whom failing by predecease without lawful issue," was that John Drummond should get the fee in the event of his surviving the longest liver of the liferenters.

As to the question with whom the fee was during their life, I am satisfied with the explanation given by your Lordship that the fee was in Alexander, but defeasible in the event of Gordon Drummond appearing, or of John surviving the liferenters.

LORD ARDMILLAN was absent.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the said interlocutor: Find that Gordon Drummond, the testator's son, is now dead, and has left no issue: Find that on the death of the testator, Alexander Drummond, in 1823, the fee of the estate vested in Alexander Drummond, the testator's nephew, subject to defeasance in the event of it appearing that Gordon Drummond survived the testator or left lawful issue, and also subject to defeasance in the event of John Drummond surviving the last survivor of the liferenters: Find that John Drummond having predeceased the last survivor of the liferenters, the fee of the estate never vested in him, and he had no power to make the deed conveying the estate in 1833, in virtue of which the pursuers claim the estate; sustain the defenders' fourth plea in law; assoilzie the defenders, and decern: Find the said defenders entitled to expenses, subject to deduction of one-third of the taxed amount," &c.

MACRAE & FLETT, W.S.—W. S. STUART, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 170.

July 20, 1876.
Walton Brothers v. Magistrates of Glasgow.

WALTON BROTHERS, Pursuers.—Fraser—Kinnear.
THE LORD PROVOST, MAGISTRATES, AND TOWN-COUNCIL OF GLASGOW, Defenders.—D.-F. Watson—M'Laren—Balfour.
Et è contra.

Servitude—Implied Grant—Ish and Entry.—The proprietor of a piece of urban ground sold a portion of it, the occupants of which had always enjoyed an access through the remaining portion, which the proprietor retained. In a question with the purchaser, held that there was an implied grant of the right of access.

Servitude—Confusio.—Opinion (per Lord President) that when two properties, standing on separate titles, and one having a servitude of passage over the other, are united in the person of one proprietor, the servitude is not in all circumstances extinguished confusione to the effect of making it necessary to constitute the servitude de novo when the proprietor alienates the original dominant tenement.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Curriehill. M.

WALTON BROTHERS, woollen waste manufacturers, Glasgow, were proprietors of 2130 yards of ground adjoining Charlotte Street and West Charlotte Lane in Glasgow. The magistrates of Glasgow were proprietors of a plot of 636 yards adjacent, and claimed to have a right of access over Walton Brothers' property, by means of a lane 20 feet wide, from Greendyke Street to West Charlotte Lane. Walton Brothers raised an action against the magistrates and other adjoining proprietors for declarator that they held their property free of any servitude of using the same, as a means of access from Lanark Street or Greendyke Street to West Charlotte Lane, or otherwise, in favour of the defenders, or any of them, and that the pursuers were entitled to erect houses and buildings on the whole of the said subjects above described, or on any part thereof, and to close up the said road or passage, &c.

No 170.

July 20, 1876. Walton Brothers v. Magistrates of Glasgow.

The action was defended by the magistrates. They set forth the titles, and pleaded;—(1) By the deeds and clauses referred to in the defenders' statement as explained by the possession and use following thereon, a servitude is constituted in favour of the defenders' tenement of a road or passage 20 feet wide through the pursuers' tenement, and leading from the defenders' property to West Charlotte Lane. (2) The defenders being vested and seized in the said servitude, are entitled to be assoilzied from the conclusions of the action, with expenses.

The history of the titles was as follows:—The subjects belonging to the pursuers and defenders formed in 1838 one plot of 2766 yards belonging to the Royal Infirmary of Glasgow. The infirmary conveyed the whole subjects to William Brown. In 1851 Brown conveyed to John Stewart 454 yards about the centre of the plot. Stewart did not take infeftment, and his trustee conveyed to Henry Walton, who was infeft in 1853. The disposition by Brown contained a declaration, also inserted in Walton's sasine, that the said John Stewart should have a right to a cart entrance of 20 feet wide by the lane or street leading from Greendyke Street through the portion retained by Brown. In 1857 Walton acquired the remainder of the subject, and was infeft. In 1870 his trustees conveyed 636 yards to Charles Craig, author of the magistrates. This plot did not include any part of the 454 yards first acquired by Walton, and was not contiguous. No grant of access was expressed in the conveyance. The remainder was acquired by Walton Brothers in 1874.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds, decerns, and declares against the defenders, the Lord Provost and Magistrates and Town-Council of Glasgow, in terms of the conclusions of the summons: Finds said defenders liable in expenses." *

The magistrates reclaimed, and also raised an action of declarator against Walton Brothers, concluding that, as proprietors of the plot of 636 yards, they were entitled to a right of access to and from their property above described by means of a lane or street of 20 feet wide, now known as Lanark Street, which leads from Greendyke Street on the south through the property above described and thence to West Charlotte Lane on the north through the property belonging to the defenders lying immediately to the north of the pursuers' said property.

There was an alternative conclusion that if the magistrates were not entitled to an access through the Waltons' ground, the latter were not entitled to access through the magistrates' ground. In other respects the averments and pleas of parties were substantially the same as in the previous action.

The Lord Ordinary, after a proof, assoilzied the defenders.

---

* "NOTE.—. . . . All possible questions as to the mutual rights and obligations of the proprietors of the 454 yards, and the remainder of the 2766 yards respectively, were excluded as soon as Henry Walton was infeft on the last-mentioned conveyance of 1857, because he then became absolute proprietor of both subjects, and the whole 2766 square yards were reunited in his person just as they had been held by Brown, so that any servitude of access which might have been created by the titles of the various parts in favour of one part over another, or any obligation on the proprietor of one or more of the parts, to perform or suffer anything in favour of the proprietor or proprietors of the other part or parts, must be held to have been then extinguished confusione, and to be now no longer in force, unless and in so far as afterwards expressly revived."

No. 170.

July 20, 1876. Walton Brothers v. Magistrates of Glasgow.

The magistrates in the second action reclaimed. Both actions were heard together.

The magistrates were allowed to add two additional pleas in defence to the first action as follows:—(3) "The conveyance by Walton's trustees to Craig of the area of 636 square yards, now vested in the defenders, carried with it by implied grant a right to and access from Charlotte Lane as then existing." (4) "In respect that at the date of the conveyance by Walton's trustees to Craig there was an access by a passage of at least 9 feet wide between the defenders' property and Charlotte Lane, the defenders are entitled to have that access reserved in the decree to be pronounced in the action."

The parties agreed by minute that the proof in the second action should be held to have been led in the first action also.

The magistrates argued;—On an examination of the titles the servitude appears never to have been extinguished confusione, and even if it were, the proof shewed that the occupiers of the magistrates' ground had always enjoyed the access claimed through the Waltons' ground, so that a purchaser was entitled to rely upon getting that access.[1]

Walton Brothers argued;—A servitude is always extinguished confusione when the dominant and servient tenements come into the hands of the same proprietor, unless the titles are of different descriptions, such as an entail and a fee-simple title, and the servitude is not revived by the subsequent separation of the subjects.[2]

At advising,—

Lord President.—The object of the later of these two actions is a declarator of servitude by the magistrates of Glasgow over the property of Walton Brothers. The action by Walton Brothers is a declarator of immunity. The servitude claimed is thus described in the summons at the instance of the magistrates—"A right of access to and from the pursuers' property by means of a lane or street of 20 feet wide now known as Lanark Street, which leads from Greendyke Street on the south through the property above described, and thence to West Charlotte Lane on the north through the property belonging to the defenders lying immediately to the north of the pursuers' said property."

The entire ground was originally the property of the Glasgow Infirmary. The infirmary had under their titles a right of access from Greendyke Street of 20 feet wide. After possessing for some time they conveyed the ground to one Brown, who granted a disposition of a portion of it to Henry Walton in 1853. That portion consisted of 454 yards about the middle of the subject, not the same as the plot of 636 yards now belonging to the magistrates, and not adjacent to it. The disposition granted a right of access 20 feet wide from Greendyke Street. Subsequently to acquiring this small bit, Henry Walton acquired the whole subject—2766 yards—in 1857.

The Lord Ordinary says that the effect of this was that the servitude was extinguished confusione. I am not quite prepared to affirm that conclusion. The servitude can hardly be said to have been absolutely extinguished. If Walton had afterwards disponed the 454 yards to somebody else, I am not prepared to

---

[1] Ewart v. Cochrane, March 25, 1861, 4 M'Q. p. 117, 33 Scot. Jur. p. 293; Ersk. Inst. 2, 6, 9; Gow's Trustees v. Mealls, May 20, 1875, ante, vol. ii. p. 729.

[2] Donaldson's Trustees v. Forbes, Feb. 1, 1839, 1 D. p. 449, 11 Scot. Jur. p. 284.

No. 170.

July 20, 1876.
Walton Brothers v. Magistrates of Glasgow.

say that it would have been necessary for him to create the servitude de novo, in order that the purchaser should have the benefit of it. The true view appears to me to be that, while the whole subject remained in the possession of Walton, there could be no existing or enforceable servitude; res sua nemini servit. But though two pieces of ground belong to one proprietor, there may be a right of access through one to the other de facto, and if it is sold it will be held to be sold with the existing access, and the disponee will be entitled to that access. The servitude, I apprehend, will revive without constitution de novo. Therefore, I do not think this case can be solved by holding that the servitude was extinguished confusione.

But, then, what followed? The ground remained with the Waltons till 1870. They then sold off a portion to Craig, who is the author of the magistrates. This piece consisted of 636 yards, not the 454 yards first acquired by Henry Walton, or including them, or contiguous to them, but disjoined. The conveyances make no mention of the access from Greendyke Street. On the titles, therefore, I come without hesitation to the same conclusion as the Lord Ordinary. It might have been an easy matter to revive the servitude. But it would have been a different and much more difficult thing to transfer it from the plot of 454 yards to an entirely different subject. And yet that is what is said to have been done.

So far, the case is very clear. But now, two additional pleas have been stated by the magistrates in defence to the action at the instance of Walton Brothers, the first of which is—"The conveyance by Walton's trustees to Craig of the area of 636 square yards, now vested in the defenders, carried with it by implied grant a right to an access from Charlotte Lane as then existing." In order to give effect to these pleas it was agreed that the proof led in the other case should be held to be led in this case.

Now, on the evidence, it seems to me plain that when this portion was conveyed by Walton's trustees to Craig there was an existing access, a moderate access not less than 9 feet wide at any part. That access had been in existence for some time prior to the conveyance to Craig, who was one of several tenants of Walton, occupying a part of the subjects which he afterwards bought. As tenant he had used the access from Charlotte Lane, and, in short, it appears quite clearly that whatever rights Walton's tenants had they all indiscriminately used the access to the south and to the north, no doubt to the north not as a carriage or cart road, but on foot, and the magistrates contend that when this portion was sold to a stranger purchaser he was entitled to rely on getting with the ground the existing access. I think that is a sound proposition. When a man sells a portion of his ground which has an access through the other portion which he reserves there is an implied grant of that access. That is the principle of the case of Cochrane v. Ewart, and a number of other decisions, and it is consistent with equity and legal principle. Nothing is better settled than that the conveyance of a piece of property implies a right of access to it. No one can possess a piece of ground without having a right of ish and entry, and the way that is to be obtained if the conveyance is silent is just the existing way. I am, therefore, for affirming the first of these additional pleas. In my view the magistrates are entitled to the access from the north which existed at the time when they purchased, as well as to an access from the south.

LORD DEAS and LORD MURE concurred.

No. 170. LORD ARDMILLAN was absent.

July 20, 1876. Walton Brothers v. Magistrates of Glasgow.

THESE interlocutors were pronounced:—

In the action at the instance of Walton Brothers against the Magistrates—"Having advised the reclaiming note for the defenders against Lord Curriehill's interlocutor, dated 13th January 1876, and heard counsel thereon, with the two additional pleas in law for the defenders, and the joint minute for the parties, No. 39 of process, and the proof therein referred to, recall the said interlocutor, sustain the third plea in law for the defenders, assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions of the summons, and decern."

In the action at the instance of the Magistrates against Walton Brothers the Court adhered to the Lord Ordinary's judgment, assoilzieing the defenders.

J. A. CAMPBELL & LAMOND—CAMPBELL & SMITH—Agents.

No. 171. ROBINOWS AND MARJORIBANKS, Pursuers.—D.-F. Watson—Balfour—Johnstone.
SMITH AND OTHERS (Ewing's Trustees), Defenders.—Trayner—Hunter.

July 20, 1876. Robinows and Marjoribanks v. Ewing's Trustees.

Marine Insurance—Foreign Average Statement—Contributory Value.—A policy of insurance effected on cargo, consisting of two lots of iron, valued therein respectively at £610 and £215, and on £25 cash advanced to account of freight, contained the following clause:—"General average payable according to foreign statement, if so made up." On the voyage the ship was damaged, and the master granted a bond of bottomry and respondentia over ship and cargo for repairs and other expenses. At the port of destination a general average statement was made up, in which £1293 was fixed as the contributory value of the cargo. The ship and freight being unable to pay their share of the bond, the balance fell to be paid, under German law, by the owners of cargo "on the principles of general average," and a second statement was made up embodying the first. Held that the policy-holders were entitled to recover the whole amount paid by them (being under £850) from the underwriters, and not only the amount effeiring to £850 out of £1293, in respect that the liability of the cargo, as shewn in the final statement, was for the general balance due under the bond after applying the proceeds of the sale of the ship and the freight.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Shand. B.

MESSRS ROBINOWS and MARJORIBANKS, merchants, Glasgow, shipped at Grangemouth in the ship "Warrior" two lots of pig-iron, of 100 and 35 tons, for delivery at Königsberg. This iron they insured with William Ewing and others, underwriters, the lots being valued in the policy at £610 and £215 respectively, which, added to £25 insured on cash advanced to account of freight, made the total value recoverable under the policy £850.

The policy contained the following clause:—"General average payable according to foreign statement, if so made up."

In the voyage the ship sustained injuries, and was obliged to put into Gottenburg to repair, where the master, having no other funds, granted a bond of bottomry and respondentia, hypothecating the ship and cargo. On arrival at Königsberg a general average statement was made up, according to which £629, 8s. was allocated on the ship, and £238, 19s. on the iron shipped by the pursuers. This average statement was made much in accordance with the English method, and the contributory value of the cargo was set down in it at £1293.

The master and owner being unable to pay their share of the contribution, the consignees of the two lots of iron which constituted the cargo,

No. 171.

July 20, 1876.

Robinows and Marjoribanks v. Ewing's Trustees.

viz. the Königsberg Vulcan Company and Messrs Otto Petzke and Company, were obliged, in order to obtain delivery of the cargo, to pay the bottomry bond, £700.

The captain and owner being unable to reimburse the consignees in the shares of the average contribution payable by the vessel, the consignees were obliged to raise a suit in the Courts of Königsberg, under which a decree for the public sale of the vessel was made, and the vessel was sold by auction for £300. Out of that sum, however, seamen's wages and a variety of other preferable charges required to be and were paid, so that no sum nearly approaching the proper contribution of the vessel could be obtained from the sale of the vessel, or from the captain and owner, and consequently the liabilities of parties fell to be regulated by article 734 of the code of the general German commercial law, which declares that "if the master, in order to continue his voyage, for the purpose of an expenditure that does not come under general average, has hypothecated the cargo, or has disposed of the cargo by sale or by appropriation, the loss sustained by one proprietor of the cargo, by reason that his claim for indemnification cannot be at all or cannot be fully satisfied out of the ship and freight, shall be borne by all the proprietors of the cargo, according to the principles of general average."

Following on this a second general average statement was made up, incorporating the first, but in which, owing to the failure of ship and freight, the iron had to bear in all £720, 4s.*

---

* The second average statement, after setting forth that the consignees of the cargo had paid the amount of the bond, £700, and £86 of expenses, and that they were only liable to pay as their contribution £238, 19s., and that their claim against the captain was for the balance of £547, and that the proceeds of the sale of the ship, after deducting expenses, was insufficient to satisfy the claim, and stating the law applicable to the case, proceeds—"The average statement has therefore been made up as follows:—

"Part I. Distribution of Charges and Expenses.

"1. The claim legally awarded to the parties interested in the cargo amounts to	£547	0	0
"Less proceeds of sale of ship, after deducting expenses,	167	0	0
	£380	0	0
"To which were added for expenses . . .	101	5	1·1
"Bringing out a total claim against the ship of .	£481	5	1·1

"Part II. Contribution.

"In the above case the value of the cargo alone can be considered as liable to the contribution, as such has been calculated in the first average statement, viz.:—

"1. Iron consigned to the Königsberg Vulcan Company,	£336	0	0
"2. Iron consigned to Petzke and Company, . .	957	0	0
"Amount of the value that has to contribute, . .	£1293	0	0

"Part III. Distribution.

"The sum to be distributed in general average amounts, according to chapter I., to £481, 5s. 1·1d., and the value laid under contribution, according to chapter II., amounts to £1293, from which an average contribution of 37·22 % results. Consequently there have to pay the underwriters of the cargo respectively.

No. 171.

July 20, 1876. Robinows and Marjoribanks v. Ewing's Trustees.

Messrs Robinows and Marjoribanks, with concurrence of the consignees, raised the present action upon the policy against the underwriters, pleading;—The pursuers having been obliged to pay the said sums of £533, 1s. and £187, 3s. of general average, conform to the statements made up and confirmed, according to the laws and practice in force at Königsberg, in respect of the said 100 tons and 35 tons of iron respectively, the defenders are, in virtue of the policy of insurance libelled, bound to reimburse the pursuers therein, according to the defenders' respective shares of the said sums, with interest, as concluded for.

The underwriters maintained that they were only liable for the proportion effeiring to £850 out of the real value of the cargo of £1293, £850 being the value in the policy.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having considered the cause, repels the defences, and decerns against the defenders in terms of the conclusions of the summons."*

"1. The Königsberg Vulcan Company, per average statement, confirmed by decree of 31st October 1872, .	£62	1	10·3
"According to the present average statement, ...	125	1	2·2
"Together, ...				£187	3 0·5
"2. The firm Otto Petzke and Company, according to the first average statement, ...	£176	17	0·9
"According to second do. . .	356	3	10·9
"Together, ...				533	0 11·8
"Total, . . .				£720	4 0·3"

* "This case raises a question of considerable importance in the law of marine insurance, the question, viz. what effect is to be given between the insurers and underwriters to the clause now usual in marine policies—'General average payable according to foreign statement, if so made up.'

"The pursuers insured a quantity of iron for the voyage from Grangemouth to Königsberg by a policy in which the iron was valued at £850. The vessel 'Warrior' sustained such injuries on the voyage as made it necessary, for the sake of ship and cargo, that she should run to Gottenburg in Sweden for repairs; and the captain, having no other means of payment, executed a bond of bottomry over ship and cargo at Königsberg. A general average statement was made up and confirmed by the proper authority, by which £629, 8s. was allocated on the ship, and £238, 19s. on the iron shipped by the pursuers. The captain and owner of the vessel having been unable to pay the amount of the contribution for the ship, the vessel was sold by order of the Court, and the price realised fell considerably short of the sum the ship ought to have contributed. In accordance with German commercial law this deficiency fell 'to be paid by all the parties interested in the cargo on the basis of the general average.' Accordingly a second general average statement was prepared and confirmed by the proper authority; and by this statement, which embraced or adopted the first, there was allocated on the pursuers' iron a sum in all of £720, 4s. This sum the pursuers were obliged to pay as general average, and they now sue the defenders, the underwriters, for indemnity. The iron, which was valued in the policy at £850, was valued for the purposes of the average statement at the higher sum of £1293, and this contributory valuation was the basis on which the pursuers' gross contribution of £720 was fixed. The defence is that the underwriters are liable only on a contributory value of £850, being the value fixed in the policy, and on which they are willing to pay; and that the pursuers must themselves bear so much of the average loss as effeirs to the difference be-

No. 171.
July 20, 1876.
Robinows and Marjoribanks v. Ewing's Trustees.

The defenders reclaimed. An additional amended statement and plea were lodged for the pursuers as follows:—"The freight of the two parcels tween the policy value of £850 and the contributory value of £1293 of the iron as estimated by the average states.

"I think it may be assumed that in the absence of the special clause on the margin of the policy, providing that general average should be payable 'according to foreign statement, if so made up,' the defenders' contention must have received effect. The point does not appear to have been the subject of judicial decision in this country, or in England. In Arnould on Insurance (4th edition, by Mr M'Lachlan, p. 816), after referring to the rule that the value of the subject insured, as between the assured and the underwriter, is the value at the time and place of sailing in an open policy, and the fixed value in a valued policy, while the contributory value for general average is the net value as the subject reaches the port of destination or adjustment, the author adds,—'Whatever is paid in contribution in respect of the excess of the contributory value over the value in the policy is paid by the assured, but for whatever is paid on a contributory value not exceeding the value in the policy the insured is indemnified in the proportion insured.' Mr M'Lachlan explains that the chapter on general average from which this quotation is made has been re-written to a great extent by himself; but on referring to the second edition of 1857, edited by Mr Arnould himself, I find that the rule as between the underwriter and the assured is stated substantially to the same effect. The authorities referred to are in Magens on Insurance, page 245, case 19. The average statement there given had reference to a loss which occurred in 1744, and in reference to which the assured and the underwriters settled on the principle stated by Mr Arnould, not because of any decision on the question, but because the principle was admitted by the assured to be sound. In Benecke on Insurance (London, 1824), pp. 328, 329, the rule for settlement in the case of an average loss made up by contribution is stated in the same way. In Phillips on Insurance, sec. 1410, it is stated that the practice in Boston, and apparently generally throughout America, is in accordance with the rule as stated by Mr Arnould, who indeed refers to Mr Phillip's work as an authority on the point. Mr Phillips, however, states that the practice is different in New York, where under a valued policy 'the underwriters contribute the whole amount assessed upon the subject in general average, whether it contributes in a value greater or less than that at which it is fixed in the policy.' He adds,—'This is a very material difference in the practice of the two places as to the mode of adjustment. There is nothing in the policy that favours one of these modes of construction in preference to the other, each being equally consistent with the language of the instrument, and the preference of the one or the other being merely a matter of construction, and the application of the general principles of insurance.' The point does not appear to be referred to in the works either of Parsons or Marshall on Insurance. The result of the authorities, however, seems to be that, in the absence of a special clause, according to the usage between merchants and underwriters, where the contributory value in the case of an average loss is greater than the value at the time and place of shipment, the underwriter pays the proportion applicable to the latter value, and the merchant pays the surplus.

"The pursuers maintain that it was a leading object of the special clause now usual in policies, not only to avoid a class of questions which had frequently occurred and caused dispute, as to whether particular cases fell under the head of general average at all, by providing that the foreign statement should be conclusive, but also to avoid all questions of revaluation of the subject insured, and new calculations, in order to allocate the average loss partly on the underwriter and partly on the assured, where the contributory value should happen to exceed the shipping value. I am of opinion that the pursuers' view is well-founded, and that, according to a sound construction of the special clause, the underwriter, to the extent of his subscription, undertakes to pay the proportion of the amount imposed on the insured as the average loss payable for the subject of insurance, as that amount is ascertained and fixed by the foreign statement, of iron (which constituted the whole cargo) amounted to £80, 5s. 5d., two-thirds of which, according to German law, was liable to contribute to and not merely the proportion of that amount which by calculation may be found to effeir to the shipping value as distinguished from the contributory value of the subject.

No. 171. July 20, 1876. Robinows and Marjoribanks v. Ewing's Trustees.

"The question now raised as to the effect of the special clause does not appear to have been the subject of discussion in any previous case. The only writer by whom it has been noticed is Mr M'Lachlan, whose views on insurance and merchant shipping law I have always found worthy of consideration, and who, at p. 818 of his edition of Arnould, states an opinion favourable to the pursuers' contention thus,—'This rule' (that is, the ordinary rule above stated) 'may in effect be set aside in virtue of a stipulation in the policy to pay general average according to foreign adjustment, and by the assumption at the port of adjustment, in accordance with the law there prevailing of higher values than those in the policy.' The parties in the course of the discussion referred to the case of Harris v. Scaramanga, June 3d, 1872, Law Reports, 7 Common Pleas, 481, in which the effect of the special clause was considered with reference to the question whether, seeing the loss sustained would not have been held to fall within general average in England, the underwriter was nevertheless liable, because the loss had been treated as general average, in accordance with the foreign law, in the foreign statement. I find that the effect of the clause has been the subject of decision in two cases since that of Harris, viz., Hendrick v. The Australasian Insurance Company, 27th April 1874, Law Reports, 9 Common Pleas, p. 460, and Marro v. The Ocean Marine Insurance Company, 8th July 1874, Law Reports, 9 Common Pleas, p. 595, affirmed in the Exchequer Chamber 11th May 1875, Law Reports, 10 Common Pleas, p. 414. In each of these three cases the underwriters sought to give to the special clause, which is the subject of the present question, a more restricted meaning than the Court held that on a sound construction it ought to receive. The contention was substantially similar in all of them, although the circumstances were materially different, viz., that the foreign statement should be held conclusive merely as to the valuations and results brought out, subject, however, to the right of the underwriters to resist liability where the loss sustained would not have been a general average loss according to the law of England. But the Court held that the underwriters were bound by the foreign statement, and that, even assuming the circumstances would not have raised a case of general average according to the law of England, the underwriters were nevertheless liable, because they had undertaken to pay general average 'according to foreign statement, if so made up.' The defenders in the present case are in the same position as the underwriters in the case of Harris as regards the question raised in that case; for the defence there stated arose in precisely the same state of circumstances as in the present case so far as regards the second average statement here founded on. It was maintained in the case of Harris that the contribution levied on the cargo in consequence of the owner's inability to pay the proportion applicable to the ship was not a loss within the perils insured against, and therefore that the average statement, though accepted as correct as regards the valuations and the results which these brought out, could not affect the underwriters so as to render them liable for what was really not an average loss. The Court were of opinion that the loss was not one which, according to the English law, could be treated as falling under general average for the purpose of contribution, so as to affect the underwriters, but because it had been so treated in the foreign statement, and in accordance with the law of the country where the statement had been prepared the underwriters were liable under the special clause in the policy.

"The result of the three cases referred to, as stated in the opinions of the learned Judges in the Exchequer Chamber, appears to be that the effect of the special clause is that general average in the cases for which it provides means average 'according to foreign, not English, rules' (p. B. Pollock). These cases do not decide the present question; but the whole scope of the opinions there de-general average; and this contribution was made accordingly. Of this sum of £80, 5s. 5d., £25 was paid to the owner of the ship before she left

No. 171.

July 20, 1876.

Robinows and Marjoribanks v. Ewing's Trustees.

livered supports the general view that the intention of the special clause, to be gathered from the general terms in which it is expressed, is to make the foreign statement of general average conclusive (assuming, of course, that it had been made up with regularity, and in accordance with the law of the foreign country), as defining and specifying the sum which the underwriters have to pay, in proportion to the amounts subscribed by them, viz., the sum which the assured has himself lost. It is obvious that this result is desirable in the interests of commerce, for it avoids opening up the foreign average statement—(1) by inquiries as to shipping value; and (2) by calculations in the preparation of a new statement for an adjustment of the loss between the owner and the assured where the contributory value has exceeded the shipping value. The insurer will naturally and reasonably desire that the average statement which fixes his liability should at the same time thereby fix the measure of liability of the underwriter, and if in practice somewhat larger payments for average loss should thus occur at times where foreign average statements are made up this must be kept in view as an element in fixing the premium, just as the circumstance that under such statements cases of liability for general average which would not come under that head by the law of this country will arise, and must be kept in view in fixing the premium. And it is not to be thrown out of view that the contributory value may often be less than the shipping value, in which case the underwriter gets the benefit. The scope of the whole opinions in the English cases is in favour of the construction of the clause which gives effect to the view now expressed; and the opinion of Chief-Justice Bovill, concurred in by Justice Keating, expressly states the view of these learned Judges to that effect. They say (L. R. 7 C. P. 489),—'Under the terms of this policy the underwriters and the assured have both agreed to accept the adjustment and statement of the average stater in the foreign port, if and when made, as conclusive as between them both in the principle and in details as to the loss which the underwriters are to undertake in respect of general average.'

"The special clause is framed in most general terms, 'general average payable according to foreign statement.' It may be possible to read it in accordance with the view maintained by the underwriters, viz., that the foreign statement (regularly made up) is to be accepted without question as the basis only for a settlement in the same way as an English average statement would be accepted, leaving open for adjustment the amount for which the underwriters shall be liable should the contributory value exceed the shipping value of the subject assured. But it appears to me to be the more natural interpretation of the general terms used, and to be more in accordance with the presumed intention of the parties, that the foreign statement should be conclusive between the parties, as furnishing the precise sum for which the underwriters, according to their several subscriptions, are liable. The question, which is the best arrangement, viz., whether the average statement should be conclusive in the sense now stated, or should, in the particular case in which the contributory values exceed the shipping values, merely form the basis for the preparation of another statement, is one on which mercantile opinion and usage are divided, as appears from the conflicting practice in Boston and New York. In the present case the parties, by the policy, have fixed the shipping value of the goods, but the question would be the same in the frequent case of open policies, and the contention of the defenders involves in that case the obtaining of a valuation of the ship or cargo as at the port of shipment after the loss occurs, not for the purpose of the average statement, but for the settlement with the underwriter. It appears to me that according to the fair reading of the clause it was not contemplated or intended that such revaluations and new adjustments should take place. 'General average' is to be 'payable according to foreign statement, if so made up,' that is, I think, the general average paid by the assured, according to the foreign statement, is to be payable to him by the underwriter. The term 'general average' thus directly refers to what the insured has paid as such. If the more limited

No. 171.

July 20, 1876.
Robinows and Marjoribanks v. Ewing's Trustees.

Grangemouth, and £55, 5s. 5d. was paid to Robert Kleyenstueber and Company, the ship's brokers at Königsberg. After paying the contribution according to the first average statement, and before the date of the second average statement, the balance of the freight was exhausted in paying wages of crew, harbour dues, ship's expenses, and other charges, which, according to German law, the value of ship being exhausted, form a charge against freight preferable to general average. Both ship and freight being exhausted, and having proved insufficient to pay the loss, the same fell, according to German law, to be paid by the cargo, and the amount ultimately allocated upon and paid by the cargo was unaffected by the contributory value put upon it. The ultimate loss would have been the same, and the amount to be paid by each lot of the iron constituting cargo would have been the same, if each lot had throughout been valued, the one at £610, and the other at £215, or if the whole cargo had been valued at £850 instead of £1293."

Plea in law;—(2) "The loss sued for having been paid in respect of the iron insured as general average, according to the foreign average statements produced, and the amount of the said loss not having been affected by the value put upon the iron in the said average statements, the pursuers are entitled to decree as concluded for.

The defenders answered—"Admitted that the freight of the two parcels of iron, constituting the whole cargo, amounted to £80, 5s. 5d.; that two-thirds of the sum was liable, according to German law, to contribute to general average, and that this rule of liability was given effect to in the first average statement. Admitted that, of said sum, £25 were paid to the owners of the ship before she left Grangemouth, and £55, 5s. 5d. to Messrs Kleyenstueber, at Königsberg. Admitted that, according to German law, the wages of ship's crew, harbour dues, and various other ship's expenses, form a charge against freight, preferable to general average, after the value of the ship has been exhausted; and that the balance of the freight has been exhausted in paying the said ship's expenses. Admitted that where the value of ship and freight prove insufficient to pay the amount of a bottomry bond, in the circumstances set forth in article 734 of the German commercial code, the deficiency falls to be made up, according to German law, by contributions from all the meaning for which the defenders contend had been the true agreement of parties, words of limitation would, I think, have been introduced, shewing that the foreign statement was to be taken, not as the fixed general average, but as forming the basis only for preparing another statement, according to which the general average should be payable. In this view the clause would have been expressed in terms not unlimited, but such as these, viz., 'General average on a sum not exceeding the shipping value,' payable 'according to foreign statement, if so made up.' The defenders' argument substantially involves the introduction of restraining or limiting words, by implication, into the clause, with the result that the general average is not payable according to the foreign statement, as it has been actually paid by the assured, which is the natural meaning of the language, but may vary according to a separate valuation to be obtained in many cases, and to be used with the foreign statement as a basis for ascertaining the general average payable. I am of opinion that this is not the true meaning of the language used, but that, having regard to the fact that the valuations of ship and cargo in foreign ports throughout the world proceed on rules and principles extremely various, and to the extreme desirability of having a simple and ready means of fixing the precise amount of the underwriter's liability, the clause in question has in effect provided that the general average payable by the underwriter shall be the sum which the assured has paid in the foreign port, that is, shall be 'according to foreign statement, if so made up.'"

---

No. 171.

July 20, 1876.

Robinows and Marjoribanks v. Ewing's Trustees.

parties interested in the cargo, on the principles of general average. Admitted that this deficiency must be so made up, whatever the amount of the contributory value of the cargo may be. Quoad ultra denied."

The defenders argued;—The German law provides that this second so-called average burden shall be apportioned among the proprietors of cargo according to the principles of general average. The rule of general average is that the three parties liable—ship, freight, and cargo—are liable in the proportion of their contributory values. As between the insurers and the underwriters the value in the policy is conclusive. As there was here a real contributory value of £1293, the owners of cargo were really self-insurers for the difference between that and £850. Consequently, they are now only entitled to recover the proportion effeiring to £850, as the second general average statement embodies the first, which was calculated on a contributory value for the cargo of £1293.[1]

The pursuers argued;—The contributory value of the cargo had no influence in bringing out the amount which it had ultimately to pay, as it simply had to pay the whole balance.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The pursuers of this action are the owners of a cargo of iron carried by the ship "Warrior" from Grangemouth to Königsberg. Unfortunately in the course of the voyage the vessel was injured, and ran to Gottenburg in Sweden for repairs; and at that port the master granted a bond of bottomry and respondentia, hypothecating the ship and cargo.

When the vessel arrived at Königsberg the cargo was delivered to the consignees, and the question arose how the bottomry bond was to be met. By the German law it seems to be provided that if the ship and freight are unable to meet the bond then the parties interested in the cargo are bound to provide payment, on the basis of general average, as it is called. But by "general average" is meant, as it seems to me, no more than this,—that the cargo shall pay the balance of the bond still remaining unpaid after the ship and freight have been exhausted.

The owners of the cargo had insured it by means of a policy which valued it at £850, which also had the clause "general average payable according to foreign statement, if so made up."

There was a general average statement, called here the first average statement, and as regards it there is no difficulty. It seems to be substantially the same as an average statement in this country. It begins by ascertaining the amount of loss incurred, then it calculates the contributory values of the different parties, and then it allocates the payments accordingly.

If we had been dealing with that average statement alone the question decided by the Lord Ordinary would have arisen. The question would then have been whether the underwriters were liable to pay the loss allocated on the cargo calculated as being of a contributory value of £1293, or whether they were liable for only so much of the loss as would have been allocated if the contributory value had been £850. But what happened afterwards altered the position of parties altogether, for the ship and freight became unable to meet the claims upon them—in fact they became, so to speak, bankrupt—and the freight was thus swallowed up and the ship had to be sold, and realised 2000 Prussian dollars. Now, in that

[1] Harris v. Scaramanga, June 3, 1872, Law Rep. 7 C. P. 481; North of England Insurance Association v. Armstrong, Law Rep. 5 Q. B. 244; Lowndes on Gen. Average, p. 298.

No. 171.
July 20, 1876.
Robinows and Marjoribanks v. Ewing's Trustees.

state of matters the German law made the cargo bear the whole loss, getting, however, the value of the proceeds of the sale. That being so, the second average statement was made up.

This was not what we call general average here, but it is so dealt with by German law, and so the clause in the policy is obligatory on the underwriters to the effect of making them liable to the owners of the cargo for this loss.

Now, what is this second average statement? It is simply an account bringing out the amount of loss the cargo must meet. That is done simply by taking the amount of the bottomry bond and expenses, and setting against it the proceeds of the sale of the ship, and then the cargo pays the balance.

Now, the value of the cargo is a matter of indifference in bringing out that result. The result would have been precisely the same whatever the value of the cargo; and accordingly the sum which the pursuers claim is just the balance brought out against them after deducting the value of the ship, and which they are made to pay.

No doubt the second average statement adopts and incorporates the first average statement, but that is only to shew what had already been laid on the cargo; but still the loss they have to meet is what they would have to pay whatever the contributory value. It comes to just the same thing as if the bankruptcy of the ship and freight had happened at once, and the cargo had had to meet what still remained due.

It appears to me that the question decided by the Lord Ordinary does not occur here, and that the pursuers are bound to bear the loss according to the foreign statement of general average; and so I concur with the Lord Ordinary in his judgment although upon different grounds.

LORD DEAS and LORD MURE concurred.

LORD ARDMILLAN was absent.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the said interlocutor in so far as it finds the pursuers entitled to expenses: Quoad ultra adhere: Find the pursuers entitled to one-half of the taxed amount of the expenses incurred by them in the Outer-House, and find them entitled to full expenses in the Inner-House," &c.

MACARA & CLARK, W.S.—DEWAR & DEAS, W.S.—Agents.

No. 172.
July 20, 1876.
Renton's Trustees v. Alison.

ROBERT ALISON AND OTHERS (Renton's Trustees), Pursuers and Real Raisers.

ROBERT ALISON AND OTHERS, Claimants and Reclaimers.—D.-F. Watson—Low.

WILLIAM ALISON AND OTHERS, Claimants and Respondents.—Balfour—J. A. Reid.

Succession—Mutual Deed—Implied Revocation, terms of—Investment—Process—Parole Proof.—Two sisters executed a mutual deed and settlement, giving their whole property each to the other in liferent, and to certain beneficiaries in fee, but reserving power to each to alter during their respective lives. Thereafter their whole funds were reinvested under the superintendence of two friends, and the new investments were taken in terms such as to confer an absolute title of property on the survivor. The surviving sister having left a new settlement,

No. 172.

July 20, 1876.

Renton's Trustees v. Alison.

conveying her whole means to trustees, in a competition between the beneficiaries under the mutual settlement and those under the later settlement, as to the property of the predeceasing sister, held (1) that it was competent to prove by parole evidence that the sisters had given no authority to change the terms of the investments; and (2) upon proof that no such authority had been given, that the predeceasing sister's property still remained under the operation of the mutual settlement.

1st Division. Lord Young. B.

On 19th May 1857 Mrs Margaret Alison or Renton and Miss Christina Alison, two sisters, residing together at Lasswade, executed a mutual disposition and settlement, whereby they disponed their whole estate, heritable and moveable, each to the other in liferent, and to Robert Alison and David Renton in fee, under burden of certain legacies. They further nominated the survivor of themselves to be sole executor of the predeceaser, and reserved to each of themselves power to alter or revoke "during their respective lives." At the date of this mutual settlement Mrs Renton was possessed of funds amounting to £1200 and the furniture of the house where they lived. Miss Alison was possessed of funds amounting to £4165. The funds were invested partly in the respective names of the sisters, and were partly in the hands of Mr George Murray, as trustee of Mr Renton, deceased, who had become embarrassed, and had executed a trust-deed for behoof of his creditors, among whom were his wife and sister-in-law, from both of whom he had borrowed money.

Subsequent to the date of the mutual settlement the whole of the investments were changed. This was managed under the direction of Mr Robert Alison and Mr George Murray, who acted as confidential advisers to the ladies, and managed their business transactions. The new investments consisted of (1) a heritable subject, the villa of Oakmount; and (2) various stocks and shares. These stocks and shares were invariably taken in the joint names of the ladies and the survivor, and the disposition of the villa was taken with a similar destination.

Thereafter, on 24th May 1862 Miss Alison died, and in September 1874 Mrs Renton died leaving a trust-disposition and settlement whereby she conveyed her whole property, heritable and moveable, to trustees, for purposes inconsistent with the terms of the mutual settlement.

In an action of multiplepoinding raised by the trustees under Mrs Renton's settlement a competition arose between Robert Alison and others, the beneficiaries under Mrs Renton and Miss Alison's mutual settlement, on the one hand, and William Alison and others, the beneficiaries under Mrs Renton's trust-settlement, on the other hand.

The beneficiaries under the mutual settlement claimed on the footing that the funds which had formed Miss Alison's separate estate at the date of the mutual settlement fell to be separated and distributed under the mutual settlement, and pleaded;—(1) The joint investment of the estates of the said Mrs Renton and Miss Alison did not operate a revocation of the said mutual disposition and settlement, which is still a valid and existing deed quoad the succession of Miss Alison. (2) The estate of the said Miss Alison falling to be distributed in terms of the said mutual disposition and settlement is such a portion of the fund in medio as may be found to correspond to the amount of the original estate conveyed by her in the said mutual disposition and settlement.

They averred, and offered to prove by the parole testimony of Messrs R. Alison and G. Murray that the new investments were taken by Messrs Alison and Murray as being in accordance, as they believed, with the terms of the mutual settlement; that the ladies gave them no authority to change the terms of the investments, but that it was the belief of both the ladies and themselves that no change had been made. They therefore argued that the mutual settlement was still operative as regarded Miss Alison's property.

No. 172. July 20, 1876. Renton's Trustees v. Alison.

The beneficiaries under Mrs Renton's settlement claimed the whole estate as falling to be distributed under that deed.

They pleaded;—(2) The fund in medio having been the sole and absolute property of the late Mrs Renton at the time of her death, the succession thereto falls to be regulated and dealt with under the deed of settlement and codicil left by her.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that the fund in medio was the sole and absolute property of the late Mrs Renton at the time of her death, and that the succession thereto falls to be regulated and dealt with in terms of the trust-disposition and settlement, and relative codicil No. 11 of process: Therefore ranks and prefers the claimants," &c.*

---

* "OPINION.—The leading question in this case regards the operation and effect of the mutual settlement at the death of Miss Alison, the predeceaser of the two testators, on 24th May 1862. It was contended that the terms of the subsequent investments of her money, and of the title taken to the Villa of Oakmount, implied a revocation by her, which she had undoubted power to make. I think this an erroneous contention; for the settlement, being testamentary, must be regarded as her last will, and as speaking in the last moments of her existence. What property she left for her will to carry, or whether she left any, is another question, which the terms of the investments and the title to Oakmount may materially affect; but there is, I think, no question of revocation.

"It is alleged, and I assume truly, that the fortunes of the two sisters were unequal, and that Miss Alison was the richer of the two. I also assume that at the date of the will their fortunes, which consisted of money, were separately invested, and therefore then distinguishable. But having only £5365 between them, and resolving to live together, it is not surprising that they should have made a common purse of it, as they did, and out of it paid for the villa which they bought to live in, and the cost of their establishment. The common purse was made by investing the money which they were respectively able to contribute upon securities, taken in their joint names, with destination to the survivor. The title to the villa was taken to them in conjunct fee and liferent, and to the longest liver of them, and to the heirs and assignees of the longest liver. They lived together in this villa on the produce of the joint purse till Miss Alison died in May 1862. This was quite consistent with the mutual will, as it would have been had they spent all they had, which they were at perfect liberty to do.

"With respect to the price paid for the villa, I think it clear that it was so much money spent by the testators in the lifetime of both, and that the villa itself, in the purchase of which the money was spent, was not, at Miss Alison's death, subject to her disposition or will as expressed in the mutual settlement, but passed in absolute property to Mrs Renton, according to the destination of the title. It is, I think, plain that Miss Alison could not, by a settlement subsequent to the title, have disposed of the villa in whole or in part to her sister's prejudice, for her sister's right was absolute and irrevocable by the terms of the title if she survived, and, as I have already observed, the mutual settlement being testamentary, speaks for each testator as at the time of her death without reference to its date. I am, therefore, of opinion that the villa does not to any extent pass under the mutual settlement, but is wholly carried by that of Mrs Renton, whose exclusive property it became by her survivance, as completely as if the disposition had been to herself alone.

"With respect to the money, of which the sisters made common purse by the terms of the investments, and the manner in which they used it for five years, it is clear that, on Miss Alison's death, it belonged prima facie to Mrs Renton, who survived. But it is proposed to subject part of it to the operation of Miss

No. 172.

July 20, 1876.
Renton's Trustees v. Alison.

The beneficiaries under the mutual settlement reclaimed, but intimated that they did not press their claim so far as the villa of Oakmount was concerned.

Alison's disposition by the mutual will, by making a separation according to the proportions in which the sisters contributed to its formation, and regarding the larger part as the estate of Miss Alison, who contributed the larger share. In aid of this view it is alleged, and offered to be proved, that Miss Alison had £4165, and Mrs Renton only £1200, and, farther, that the investments were taken in their joint names, with right of survivorship, by the claimants Alison and Murray, 'as being in conformity with the terms of the said mutual disposition and settlement, of which they had been made aware,' but without specially consulting the ladies.

"It would obviously be a difficult and uncertain process to effect a separation of money which had been so amalgamated and used by two sisters as a common fund for five years. I must assume that the sisters knew that the money had been amalgamated, and that all their joint expenditure was met out of it. There is nothing to shew that they intended an ultimate separation, and no accounts to enable the Court to make a separation. It does not appear whether their house and personal expenses were wholly paid out of income, or trenched to any extent on capital. The price of the villa must have been paid out of the capital. How is this to be apportioned? To hold either that the sisters contributed equally, or in proportion to the original fortune of each, or that either of them paid the whole of it, would be mere assumption without evidence. But a division of the remainder could not be effected without determining this question, which the sisters have left no means of determining. I assume that the fortunes of the sisters were originally unequal to the extent stated, because, though this is not admitted, the fact is alleged to be so, and proof of it offered. But, as five years before the death of the predeceaser they joined them together on securities ex facie of which they were their joint property, in equal shares, with benefit of survivorship, and allowed matters to stand so during the remainder of their joint lives, I think this must be taken to be according to their intention, and that the operation and effect of the mutual will must be judged of accordingly. The will did not restrain them from dealing with their money as they pleased while they both lived, and with regard to all or any of it which they so dealt with as to become their joint property while they both lived, and on the death of either the exclusive property of the survivor, I think it clear that the will of the predeceaser, as expressed in the settlement, has no operation. It is not a question of revocation, for the will at Miss Alison's death stood with respect to any money or property subject to its operation, that is, with respect to all money and property of hers which, had she died intestate, would have passed to her legal heirs. It is clear that had Miss Alison died intestate the whole invested money, as well as the villa of Oakmount, would have passed, not to her legal heirs, but to her surviving sister, and this as the necessary, and I must assume intended, consequence of her own acts. The result is that there is nothing left for her will to take effect upon; but this is an accident, for she might have left other property. It is to be observed that the settlement is not only testamentary but quite general, so that there is here no such question as might arise with respect to a particular estate or property standing on a prior special destination.

"I am therefore of opinion that, on the death of Miss Alison, Mrs Renton became proprietor of the money as well as the villa, with absolute power to dispose of both; and I arrive at this conclusion with the more satisfaction, because I think it is not only the legal result of what was done, but is in accordance with what was intended. Mrs Renton's subsequent will was her own affair, and her sister probably could not, or did not, anticipate what she might do, but I think it was intended that she might do as she pleased.

"The result is that the whole fund in medio being, in my opinion, the property of Mrs Renton at the time of her death, is carried by her settlement, for there is no question of her power to revoke and alter the prior mutual settlement with respect to her own property."

No. 172.

July 20, 1876. Renton's Trustees v. Alison.

They argued;—The terms of an investment could not revoke a probative deed. This had been repeatedly decided in the case of deposit-receipts, &c.[1] Taking all the money out of the operation of the settlement was practical revocation. The investments were not made with any view of change, and the claimants were entitled to prove that prout de jure.

The beneficiaries under Mrs Renton's will argued;—The investors were the mandataries of the ladies. The effect of the terms of the investments was not to revoke the mutual settlement, but simply to take these monies out of its operation.

The Court allowed a proof. The import of it, which was not seriously disputed, was that Messrs R. Alison and G. Murray had managed the whole affairs of the ladies, and that they had taken the new investments in the terms they did, not owing to any direction to that effect, but at their own hands, supposing that they were in accordance with the terms of the mutual settlement, which they had seen.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question raised in this multiplepoinding is the effect to be given to a mutual disposition and settlement executed by two sisters, Mrs Renton and Miss Alison, on the 19th of May 1857. They were possessed of considerable means, although not equally wealthy, Miss Alison having more than Mrs Renton. They resolved to settle their estates by this deed in favour of certain parties. The deed provides first a liferent to each other, and a fee equally between Robert Alison and David Renton, and then after certain legacies, it further nominates the survivor of the two ladies to be the sole executor of the predeceaser, and it also contains a power of revocation.

Miss Alison died first, and Mrs Renton availed herself of the reserved power of revocation, and there can be no doubt that her deed is an effectual revocation so far as her estate is concerned, but the question is whether, in respect of certain changes made in investment, the great bulk of the estate is so destined as to be the property of the survivor, in which case Mrs Renton had right to dispose of it; and then there is the further question, whether she did so by her deed, which is a general one, and carries all she is entitled to dispose of.

The first alteration that occurred after the mutual settlement was the purchase of a heritable subject, and the disposition taken from the seller was granted to "Mrs Renton and Miss Alison in conjunct fee and liferent, and to the longest liver of the said Mrs Renton and Miss Alison, and to the heirs and assignees of the longest liver, heritably and irredeemably."

There can be no doubt at all that the effect of that disposition was to take the villa of Oakmount out of the mutual disposition and settlement. It was a re-settlement of that property, and destined it to the longest liver of the two. That has not been seriously disputed. But as regards the rest of the estate, the question is one of a different kind. It appears that their moveable property was invested in stocks and other property of that kind, and the two claimants, Mr George Murray and Mr Robert Alison, were the confidential friends and advisers of the ladies in making these investments. It is said that these investments were made not for the purpose of making a change, but for a different purpose altogether; but undoubtedly their terms, if they received effect as a destination, would have the effect of altering, or rather of taking out of the mutual settlement this property and giving it to the survivor, and the question is, is that the legitimate effect of the terms in which these investments were made? It is a question of some delicacy, and a proof has been led. At first sight there seems a little danger in admitting parole evidence, but when the point is fairly considered the difficulty, I think, disappears. It appears that the investments were taken in these terms by Mr Murray, and he is responsible for them. But it is said he did so without authority, and the ladies were not aware of any change, or, at least, of there being such a change as could affect the mutual settlement. It is a question of fact whether Mr Murray acted with or without authority. If he acted without, I cannot think that the terms of the investments can be allowed to affect the succession of these ladies; and if he acted with, then comes the question whether the terms of the investments really operated as destinations. But, in my opinion, the result of the evidence is that Mr Murray acted without authority, and that the ladies were unaware of the change. If they had been acquainted with business they might have known, but as it was, it was only to be expected that they should not. Mr Murray having done this at his own hand, it cannot affect the succession of the ladies. Indeed, if we are to believe Mr Murray, and I see no reason to suspect his entire sincerity, he was under the impression that the terms of the investments were such as to facilitate the execution of the mutual settlement. He took them in the joint names of Mrs Renton and Miss Alison, and the survivor, and he had in view that by the mutual settlement the survivor was executrix of the predeceaser, and he not unnaturally thought that the survivor would thus more easily step into possession of the property. This is a very probable explanation; but whether this was his object or not, what he did cannot affect the succession of the ladies, and so this property will still fall under the operation of the mutual settlement, and, consequently, Mrs Renton could only convey what originally belonged to herself. It may be difficult to separate the two estates after all that has happened, but that difficulty can hardly affect the rights of parties. The disturbing element is Mrs Renton's new settlement. If there had been no new settlement there would have been no difficulty. But the fact of her exercising her power of revocation cannot prejudice other parties from claiming under the original deed.

[1] Keddie v. Christie, Nov. 24, 1848, 11 D. 145, 21 Scot. Jur. 26; Cuthill v. Burns, March 20, 1862, 24 D. 849, 34 Scot. Jur. 426; Watt's Trustees, July 1, 1869, 7 Macph. 930, 41 Scot. Jur. 626; Dingwell v. Askew, Feb. 5, 1788, 1 Cox (Equity Cases), 427; Taylor v. Taylor, Feb. 16, 1853, 10 Hare, 475; North British Railway Co. v. Tunnock, Nov. 1, 1864, 3 Macph. 1, 37 Scot. Jur. 1; M'Laren on Wills, i. 262.

I am therefore for recalling the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and remitting to his Lordship to fix the fund in medio, and in doing so it will be necessary to separate the two estates, however difficult a matter that may be.

LORD DEAS.—It was not contended in this case, as it has been in some cases, that the mutual settlement could not be revoked after the death of one of the makers. That might have been a difficult proposition to have maintained here, looking to the terms of the settlement as to the survivor. But as it has not been maintained, it does not fall to be considered. Laying that, therefore, aside, I am disposed to come to the same conclusion with your Lordship; but I do not rest so much as I understand your Lordship to do on the parole testimony. We have not the terms of the investments fully before us, nor the particulars connected with each of them. For example, as to the debenture bond for £3000.

No. 172.
July 20, 1876.
Renton's Trustees v. Alison.

I do not see it alleged that the ladies signed any document connected with that debenture bond; but they did sign in connection with other investments. That being so, I should be chary of allowing parole testimony to contradict the inference which would otherwise be drawn from the writings. But to this extent the parole testimony is admissible,—that these two gentlemen—especially Mr Alison—had a general authority to invest in such way as they thought best to produce the annual income on which these two ladies were to live. I do not think that these writings infer any authority to make destinations. The whole object—except as regards the heritable property, as to which I agree with your Lordship—seems to have been to make temporary investments in order to augment the income. The parole testimony goes to shew that, and is so far good. But apart from the parole testimony, the circumstances are very strong in favour of the result at which your Lordship arrives. These two ladies were living together, and to the full extent of their joint income. The object of investing was to increase that joint income, and that was the object of the authority. I do not think it was intended by the ladies or any one else to change the destinations by the terms of these temporary investments, more especially as by the mutual settlement itself the survivor was to be executor of the predeceaser, and the investments were probably taken to the survivor just because she was to be executor. On the whole, I agree with your Lordship.

Lord Mure.—I concur. There is a great deal to be said in favour of the view just taken by Lord Deas. Looking to the terms of the mutual settlement, without reference to parole evidence, I am disposed to think it might be held that when the investments were taken to the two sisters jointly and the survivor it was meant to refer to the mutual settlement, and that would be enough for the disposal of the present case.

On the other view of the case I have not much difficulty. I am aware of the delicacy there is in allowing parole evidence to any extent as modifying writing. I believe it is not, in the ordinary case, competent to admit it to prove intention in the broad sense of that expression. But I concur with your Lordship in the chair that it may be admitted to the limited extent here proposed. These two gentlemen, Mr Murray and Mr Alison, managed the property and made the investments; and these investments give rise to the question whether they can be allowed to affect the terms of the mutual settlement. That settlement could not, I conceive, be altered by one of the parties only. But the question here is, whether anything was done by them jointly during their lives which can be held to have operated a change. Now, what was averred was that these investments were ordinary acts of administration on the part of Mr Murray and Mr Alison, made at their own hand, in the belief that they were in conformity with the terms of the settlement, but without instructions from the ladies, who knew nothing of their terms. Of that I think it was competent to admit parole proof. The result of that proof is, that I have no doubt this change was made without authority, and so cannot be allowed to affect their mutual settlement.

Lord Ardmillan was absent.

This interlocutor was pronounced:—"Having resumed consideration of the cause, with the proof for the claimants, Robert Alison and others, and heard counsel further on the reclaiming note for them against Lord Young's interlocutor of 10th July 1875, recall the

No. 172.
July 20, 1876.
Renton's Trustees v. Alison.

said interlocutor: Find that the villa of Oakmount, being part of the estate in medio, was, by the operation of the conveyance thereof to the now deceased Miss Christina Alison and Mrs Margaret Renton, effectually settled on them in conjunct fee and liferent, and to the longest liver, and to the heirs and assignees of the longest liver, and that the said Mrs Margaret Renton, having survived the said Miss Christina Alison, became the absolute fiar of the whole of the said heritable subjects: Find that the investment of the funds of the said Christina Alison and Mrs Margaret Renton in the terms mentioned in the record had not the effect of altering the mutual settlement made by these ladies in 1857, or of taking these funds out of the operation of the said mutual settlement, or of affecting the succession to the means and estate of the said Christina Alison as regulated by the said mutual settlement: Therefore find that the trust-disposition and settlement of Mrs Renton, dated 9th December 1868, and codicil thereto, dated 15th April 1874, can receive effect only as a settlement of the villa of Oakmount, and of so much of the said invested funds as originally belonged to the said Mrs Margaret Renton, and cannot receive effect as a settlement of that part of the said invested funds which originally belonged to Miss Christina Alison: With these findings, remit to the Lord Ordinary to ascertain and determine the amount of the fund in medio, and to proceed further as shall be just; reserving all questions of expenses."

J. & J. TURNBULL, W.S.—LEBURN & HENDERSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 173.
July 20, 1876.
Forgie v. Stewart and M'Donald.

JOHN FORGIE, Suspender.—Mair.
STEWART AND M'DONALD, Respondents.—R. V. Campbell.

Suspension and Liberation—Reincarceration.—Held that reincarceration of a debtor on the same diligence is legal, and that it lies upon the debtor to shew an oppressive use of such diligence to entitle him to the equitable interference of the Court.

Bill-Chamber. 1ST DIVISION. Lord Rutherfurd Clark. B.

JOHN FORGIE, draper in Newcastle, was arrested on a meditatione fugæ warrant at the instance of Messrs Stewart and M'Donald, Glasgow, at Ayr, on 12th May 1875. He found caution, and Stewart and M'Donald raised an action against him in the Court of Session, and on 2d July 1875 they obtained decree against him for £225, 16s. 4d., with interest and expenses.

In his note the Lord Ordinary expressed his opinion that the evidence given by Forgie had been "a tissue of falsehoods."

Stewart and M'Donald charged Forgie upon the said decree, and on 18th November 1875 they incarcerated him.

Forgie applied for aliment, and Stewart and M'Donald lodged the sum of £10, and were given to understand that notice would be sent to them on that sum becoming exhausted.

On 28th March 1876 Forgie raised a summons of cessio, but after hearing parties the Court refused the cessio.

On 20th June 1876 the aliment became exhausted unknown to Stewart and M'Donald. The pursuer applied to the magistrates, and was liberated.

On 23d June Stewart and M'Donald reincarcerated Forgie, and lodged a further sum for aliment.

Forgie presented this note of suspension and liberation, and pleaded;—(1) The complainer having been incarcerated at the instance of the respondents, and detained for a period of seven months in prison upon the warrant of imprisonment dated 18th November 1875, and liberated on 20th June 1876, it was illegal and ultra vires to reincarcerate him without a new charge being given to the complainer, and a new warrant of imprisonment being obtained against him. (2) The complainer having been detained in prison at the instance of the respondents till 20th June 1876, for a period of seven months, it was illegal and oppressive to reincarcerate the complainer on the 23d June 1876, three days after his liberation, there being no change in the meantime in the complainer's circumstances, and the complainer ought therefore to have liberation granted as prayed for.

No. 173.

July 20, 1876. Forgie v. Stewart and M'Donald.

The respondents pleaded;—(2) The liberation of the complainer under the Act of Grace has no effect on the chargers' diligence, and they were entitled to put the same in force without a new charge and new warrant of imprisonment. (3) The chargers not having made any oppressive use of their diligence, the imprisonment of the complainer is legal, and there are no grounds for the equitable interference of the Court therewith. (5) The alleged exhaustion of the aliment lodged by the chargers having arisen from no wilful refusal or delay on their part to provide aliment, but solely from their agent's reliance upon receiving notice as promised, the complainer's imprisonment is valid.

The Lord Ordinary refused the note, with expenses.

The complainer reclaimed, and argued;—He only insisted on the second plea. To warrant reincarceration on the same diligence the onus lay on the incarcerating creditor to shew a change of circumstances in the debtor.[1] It was through the negligence of the respondents that the aliment was exhausted.

Argued for the respondents;—The doctrine laid down by Lord Balgray in Mackenzie v. Maclean had been overruled. It was now settled that reincarceration was always legal, but that the Court would interfere if the power was oppressively used.[2] There were no circumstances here to justify the Court in interfering. There was no negligence on the part of the respondents, as they ought to have been informed when the aliment was exhausted.

Lord President.—A decree was pronounced in favour of the respondents against the complainer on the 2d of July 1875, in the Court of Session, for the sum of £225, 16s. 4d., with interest, and upon that decree the complainer was charged, and a fiat of imprisonment granted, and he was incarcerated.

Then he applied for aliment, and that aliment continued to be paid till the 20th of June 1876. The sum provided for aliment was then exhausted, and on the same day a certificate to that effect was granted by the governor of the prison, upon which the bailies of the city of Edinburgh granted warrant for his liberation, and he was liberated accordingly.

It is not said that the fact of the aliment having been exhausted was intimated to the chargers or their agent, and in point of fact it was not. They allege, on the other hand, and in the absence of any contrary statement it may be

---

[1] Mackenzie v. Maclean, Jan. 14, 1830, 8 S. 306, 2 Scot. Jur. 145; Crawford v. Dawson, March 11, 1836, 14 S. 688, 8 Scot. Jur. 306.

[2] Denovan v. Cairns, Feb. 1, 1845, 7 D. 378, 17 Scot. Jur. 182; Pender v. Macarthur, Jan. 28, 1846, 8 D. 408, 18 Scot. Jur. 186; White v. Robertson, Nov. 24, 1858, 21 D. 28, 31 Scot. Jur. 12; Inglis v. Taylor, July 10, 1833, 11 S. 955, 5 Scot. Jur. 548; Erskine, 4, 3, 28; Abercromby, 1759, M. 11,811; Pollock, 1769, M. 11,815; Boyd v. Ponton, Dec. 21, 1811, F. C.

No. 173.

July 20, 1876.
Forgie v. Stewart and M'Donald.

fairly assumed as the fact, that they had lodged a sum of £10 to meet the aliment, and had been informed that notice would be given when the sum was nearly exhausted, which notice they had never received.

In these circumstances the complainer was reincarcerated by the chargers three days after his liberation, and he now complains of that as an illegal proceeding. If by that is meant that reincarceration cannot take place on the same diligence I know of no authority for the proposition. Such reincarceration is perfectly legal, but on the other hand it depends on circumstances whether it is to be allowed, and it is in the power of the debtor to come to the Court if there is anything oppressive in the proceeding.

I see no cause here to justify the Court in interfering with this diligence. It is plain that this man absconded, that he was found in the county of Ayr, and was arrested upon a meditatione fugæ warrant. He found caution, and thereupon an action was raised. He resisted on discreditable grounds, as appears from the judgment of the Lord Ordinary. Therefore the position of this person and his conduct is just as unfavourable as anything could be.

But he maintains as a proposition that it must always be shewn that there has been "a change of circumstances" to warrant reincarceration. I am not able to agree to this. There is some ground for this in the opinions of some eminent Judges, but the doctrine is repudiated by other Judges equally eminent, and I prefer the opinion of the latter. I think it lies on the party incarcerated to shew something oppressive, and here there is no appearance of any such thing.

I also observe that in those cases where reincarceration was not allowed it was always upon the ground of negligence on the part of the incarcerating creditor. That is not the case here.

The fact of the aliment having been exhausted was not known to them, and though, if vigilant, they might have found it out, still that does not amount to such negligence as in other cases where intimation had been made.

I have no hesitation in adhering to the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD DEAS and LORD MURE concurred.

LORD ARDMILLAN was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

A. NIVISON, S.S.C.—MACNAUGHTON & FINLAY, W.S.—Agents.

No. 174.

July 20, 1876.
M'Laren, &c. v. Menzies.

JOHN M'LAREN AND OTHERS (Hon. C. E. C. Norton's Executors and Disponees), Petitioners.—D.-F. Watson—Crawford.
DAME GRACE CHARLOTTE NORTON OR MENZIES, Respondent.—Balfour—Hunter.

Writ—Authentication—Conveyancing and Land Transfer (Scotland) Act, 1874, sec. 39.—Held, by a majority of seven Judges, that a writing in the form of a deed, consisting of more than one sheet, and bearing the name of the alleged granter by way of subscription on the last page only, along with the names, also by way of subscription, of two attesting witnesses, may be proved by evidence prout de jure to be a "deed, instrument, or writing subscribed by the granter or maker" within the meaning of the 39th section of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, (diss. Lord Neaves, Lord Ormidale, and Lord Curriehill, who held that, in order to render the enactment applicable, each separate or separable sheet of the writing must be authenticated by the subscription of the granter).

No. 174.

July 20, 1876.
M'Laren, &c.
v. Menzies.

2D DIVISION.
R.

THIS was a petition, under the Conveyancing and Land Transfer Act, 1874, sec. 39,* presented in November 1875 by Mr John M'Laren and others, who stated that they were the executors and disponees under the last will of the late Honourable Caroline Elizabeth Conyers Norton aftermentioned.

The petition set forth that Miss Norton died in the island of Madeira on 20th July 1875, that she was a British subject, and that her domicile of origin was Scotch; that she left a last will, produced with the petition, dated 13th July 1875, by which she disposed of the greater part of her means and estate, consisting of heritable and moveable property in Scotland and elsewhere; that the will was in ordinary form, according to the practice of conveyancers in Scotland, with the exception of the testing-clause; that it was written on two sheets of paper, and consisted of five pages exclusive of an attestation, which was written partly on the sixth page; that it bore the subscription of the testatrix, together with her seal on the fifth page only; and that the subscription bore to be attested by three witnesses subscribing, but not designed.

The deed produced consisted of two sheets, one stitched within the other, the outer sheet forming the first, second, seventh, and eighth pages, and the inner sheet the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth pages. The last part was as follows:—

"Lastly: I consent to registration of these presents for preservation.—In witness whereof I have signed and sealed these presents at my residence, the Quinta das Maravilhas, in the island Madeira, this thirteenth day of July one thousand eight hundred and seventy-five.

"(L. S.) "C. E. C. NORTON.
CAROLINE ELIZABETH CONYERS NORTON.

"Signed and sealed by the testatrix, the above named Caroline Elizabeth Conyers Norton, and acknowledged by her to be her last will and testament, in presence of us, present at the same time, who at her request, in her presence, and in the presence of each other, have hereunto subscribed our names as witnesses. Quinta das Maravilhas, in the island of Madeira, this thirteenth day of July one thousand eight hundred and seventy-five.

"JNO. HOLLAND PAYNE.
"FRANCIS GORBELL TABB.
"FRANK BURRIDGE FOY."

The will was written on the first five pages, and bore Miss Norton's name by way of subscription upon the fifth page, followed by the docquet which finished on the sixth page with the names of the three attesting witnesses also by way of subscription. The seventh and eighth pages were blank. The deed contained no subscription of Miss Norton except that at the end of the deed. The ends of the thread by which the two sheets were stitched together were sealed under wax, bearing Miss Norton's seal, beside her subscriptions on the fifth page.

* "No deed, instrument, or writing subscribed by the granter or maker thereof, and bearing to be attested by two witnesses subscribing, and whether relating to land or not, shall be deemed invalid, or denied effect, according to its legal import, because of any informality of execution, but the burden of proving that such deed, instrument, or writing so attested was subscribed by the granter or maker thereof, and by the witnesses by whom such deed, instrument, or writing bears to be attested, shall lie upon the party using or upholding the same, and such proof may be led in any action or proceeding in which such deed, instrument, or writing is founded on, or objected to, or in a special application to the Court of Session, or to the Sheriff within whose jurisdiction the defender in any such application resides, to have it declared that such deed, instrument, or writing was subscribed by such granter or maker, and witnesses."

No. 174.

July 20, 1876.
M'Laren, &c.
v. Menzies.

The petitioners averred;—"The said last will was subscribed on the date which it bears by the said Caroline Elizabeth Conyers Norton as maker thereof, and by John Holland Payne, wine merchant, Madeira, and Francis Gorbell Tabb, and Frank Burridge Foy, both clerks to the Brazilian Telegraph Company, Funchal, Madeira, as witnesses attesting her subscription. At the time of subscribing the will Miss Norton also sealed it with her signet ring, the seal being placed upon the thread by which the two sheets are stitched together."

The petitioners prayed the Court to appoint intimation on the walls and in the minute-book, and service on Miss Norton's heir and personal representatives, "and to allow answers in eight days; and on resuming consideration hereof, to allow the petitioners a proof of the averments contained in this petition, and thereafter to find and declare that the last will above mentioned was subscribed by the said Caroline Elizabeth Conyers Norton, as maker thereof, and by the said John Holland Payne, Francis Gorbell Tabb, and Frank Burridge Foy, as witnesses attesting the subscription of the said Caroline Elizabeth Conyers Norton; and to find the petitioners entitled to the expenses of the present proceedings out of the estate of the said Caroline Elizabeth Conyers Norton; or to do otherwise in the premises as your Lordships may think fit."

The petition having been intimated and served, and no one appearing to object, the Court, by interlocutor, dated 14th December 1875, before answer, allowed the petitioners a proof of their averments.

The proof, which was taken on commission in Madeira, conclusively established that the document produced to the Court had been prepared according to Miss Norton's direct instructions; that it had been carefully read over by her; that it was subscribed by her at the place and on the day mentioned in it in presence of the witnesses whose names it bore; and that at the same time the ends of the thread, by which the sheets were attached, were brought together by Miss Norton and sealed by her with her seal; that the docquet was immediately thereafter written by the witness Payne, and signed by all the witnesses; and finally the deed was handed back to Miss Norton, who said that it was all right.

On 6th January 1876 the Court allowed answers to the petition to be lodged for the Honourable Dame Grace Charlotte Norton or Menzies, sister and one of the next of kin of Miss Norton, in which she submitted "that the prayer of the petition ought to be refused, in respect that at the dates of the last will mentioned in the petition and of her death, viz., 13th and 20th July 1875, Miss Norton, although then resident in Madeira, retained her Scottish domicile, which was her domicile of origin; and that the said last will is invalid, and is incapable of being validated, not being executed according to the requirements of the law in force either in Madeira or in Scotland. In particular, and with reference to the law of Scotland, it is not subscribed by Miss Norton in the sense of 'The Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874,' sec. 39. It consists of two separate sheets of paper, on one of which there is no subscription or other writing by Miss Norton."

The case having been heard before the Second Division, the Court being equally divided, appointed the case to be heard before themselves and three Judges of the First Division.

Argued for the petitioners;—The word "subscribing," both in popular language and in the law of Scotland, meant signing one's name at the end of a document. The same word "subscribed" was used in the 39th section with regard to the granter and with regard to the witnesses who never signed anything but the last page. Signing each

No. 174.

July 20, 1876.
M'Laren, &c.
v. Menzies.

page was not called subscribing in the statute which introduced it.* It was a formality of an entirely different character from the operative signature at the end of the deed, required by the statute 1540, c. 117, and not introduced till a hundred and fifty years after. It came in place of side-scribing the joinings in deeds written roll-ways, which rested on custom merely, until the Act 1696 made it imperative in deeds after that date written in that form.[1] So long as the deed was sufficiently identified the statute 1696, c. 15, was not strictly construed.[2] But the question was not whether this was a probative deed, for admittedly it was not. The statute of 1874 said that probative deeds (including deeds raised to that rank by the 38th section) should enjoy their former privileges, but that there should be a new rule in regard to improbative deeds. The law now allowed the validity of a deed, if it could be proved that it was subscribed by the granter and witnesses. "Subscribed" could not mean formally executed, for the section was dealing with deeds in which there was such informality of execution as to render them invalid had it not been for the provisions of the section. Indeed, it was not easy to give any meaning to the 39th section if it did not apply to the omission to sign each page, for the other formalities previously required were dispensed with by the 38th section. The petitioners did not found upon the seal and thread further than as part of the evidence which established the identity of the deed now produced with the will signed by Miss Norton. That evidence left no room for doubt.

Argued for Lady Menzies;—In the absence of any enactment to the contrary the words "subscribed by the granter" must mean subscribed according to the existing law. Subscribing a deed was to adopt the deed as one's own, the whole deed, and not merely the last page, which might contain nothing but a few unimportant words. How could a signature on what was said to be the last page of a deed shew that the granter had adopted other sheets? This was not a deed informally executed. It was not executed at all. Indeed, it was not a "deed, instrument, or writing" of any one. It was merely two pieces of paper with writing upon them, one of which contained nothing to shew that Miss Norton had ever adopted it or even seen it. The case must be decided precisely in the same way as if the two sheets produced to the Court had been found one lying loose within the other; for to attach any importance to the seal and thread as a mode of authentication was to go back to that state of matters which the Legislature had found it necessary to put an end to upwards of three centuries ago by the Act 1540, c. 117. To allow a deed to be set up by parole evidence would be a revolution in the law of Scotland which was not to be presumed without very express language in the statute. If such a change had been intended it would have been easy to say that no deed subscribed by the granter on the last page should be denied effect.

At advising,—

Lord Deas.—This is an application, presented under section 39 of the statute

* The Act 1696, c. 15, allows parties to choose whether they will have their deeds "written in sheets battered together as formerly, or to have them written by way of book, in leafs of paper, either in folio or quarto, providing that if they be written bookways every page be marked by the number, First, Second, &c., and signed as the margins were before, and that the end of the last page make mention how many pages are therein contained, in which page only witnesses are to sign in writs and securities where witnesses are required by law."

[1] M'Donald v. M'Donald, Dec. 18, 1714, M. 16,808.

[2] Smith v. Bank of Scotland, July 4, 1816, F. C.

No. 174.
July 20, 1876.
M'Laren, &c.
v. Menzies.

37 and 38 Vict. c. 94, to have it declared that a deed bearing to be the last will and testament of the late Honourable Caroline Elizabeth Conyers Norton, then residing in the island of Madeira, and to have been signed and sealed by her there on 13th July 1875, and to dispose of certain personal estate belonging to her, as well as of her heritable estate in Scotland, was subscribed by her and the witnesses whose names are attached thereto.

The enactment relied on bears that "no deed, instrument, or writing subscribed by the granter or maker thereof, and bearing to be attested by two witnesses subscribing, and whether relating to land or not, shall be deemed invalid or denied effect according to its legal import because of any informality of execution, but the burden of proving that such deed, instrument, or writing so attested was subscribed by the granter or maker thereof, and by the witnesses by whom such deed, instrument, or writing bears to be attested, shall be upon the party using or upholding the same."

The deed now in question consists of two sheets of paper, the one stitched within the other. The name of the granter is written, by way of subscription, on the fifth page, followed by a docquet which finishes on the sixth page with the names, also by way of subscription, of the three attesting witnesses, but without their designations.

The informality of execution which is said to render the present application competent and necessary is that the granter has not subscribed all or any of the first four pages.

The principal Scotch statutes bearing upon the subscription and authentication of deeds (other than sasines, which are not necessary here to be considered) are 1579, c. 80; 1593, c. 179; 1681, c. 5; and 1696, c. 15.

The solemnities required by these statutes have been greatly lessened by recent legislation. Sealing has been long dispensed with. As Lord Ordinary in the case of Thomson v. M'Crummen's Trustees, 1st Feb. 1856, 18 D. 470, 28 Scot. Jur. 205, I came to the conclusion that pagination was essential in deeds written upon more than one sheet, and indeed that all the requirements of the Act 1696, c. 15, were necessary solemnities in deeds written bookways; and in that opinion I was confirmed by the unanimous judgment of the Inner-House affirmed by the House of Lords. It was, however, soon afterwards enacted by statute that the want of pagination should no longer be a nullity. The statute under which we are now asked to proceed goes much farther. It provides, in section 38, that it shall be no objection to the probative character of a deed, instrument, or writing, whether relating to land or not,—1st, that the writer or printer is not named or designed; 2d, that the number of pages is not specified—that is to say, not specified in the deed, instrument, or writing itself; 3d, that the witnesses are not named or designed in the body of the deed, instrument, or writing, or in the testing-clause thereof, provided that where the witnesses are not so named and designed their designations shall be appended to or follow their subscriptions, to which they may be added at any time before the document is registered for preservation or founded on in Court,—it being farther provided that the designations so added need not be written by the witnesses themselves. Prior to the statute of 1874 each or any of these three objections would have been fatal to the deed, and not suppliable in any way. But if I read the modern statute law rightly, including section 38 of this statute of 1874, a deed is now probative, on the face of it, if three requisites are complied with—1st, if there are subscribing witnesses; 2d, if

No. 174.

July 20, 1876.
M'Laren, &c.
v. Menzies.

these witnesses are either designed in the deed or testing-clause, or their designations are added to their subscriptions before the deed is recorded for preservation, or is founded on in Court, it being provided, as I have already said, that the designations "need not be written by the witnesses themselves"; 3d, if the deed be subscribed by the granter on the last page in the case of a deed on one sheet only, or subscribed by him on each of the sheets or pages in the case of a deed written on more than one sheet.

If the first of these requisites be omitted—that is to say, if the deed does not bear to be attested by at least two witnesses—no remedy is provided. The objection is necessarily fatal to the deed.

If the second of these requisites be omitted at the time of completing the deed the remedy is in the hands of the parties themselves; the designations of the witnesses may be appended to their subscriptions so long as the deed is not recorded or founded on in Court, and these designations "need not be written by the witnesses themselves." If this easy remedy be not timeously adopted the parties interested have themselves to blame. The deed will not be an effectual deed.

If the third of these requisites be omitted to the extent of having no subscription of the granter on the last page, the deed will, of course, be ineffectual as never having been completed by the granter. But if the deed bears to be subscribed by the granter and two witnesses on the last page, then, although it consists of more than one sheet, and is not subscribed on the previous sheets or pages as well as on the last page, so that it would be, prima facie, improbative, there is a remedy provided by the statute of 1874, and that remedy is that the party using or upholding the deed shall take the burden of proving that the subscriptions of the granter and witnesses at the end of the deed were truly and intelligently adhibited to the deed. If the deed had been ex facie probative as it stood, the verity of the subscriptions and the binding nature of the deed would, of course, have been taken for granted, and could only have been disproved by an objecting party in a reduction.

I do not at all depreciate the serious nature of the omission to subscribe the previous sheets or pages of a deed written bookways upon more than one sheet. I think it is the omission of a solemnity required by the Act 1696, c. 15. Prior to that Act, if more than one sheet was used, the sheets required to be battered together, so as to admit of being rolled up, and sidescribing, as it was called, was required only so far as necessary to shew the connection of the sheets, and not as matter of solemnity. But the effect of the Act 1696, c. 15, was to recognise and set up sidescribing as a necessary solemnity in deeds written in the old fashion. It was so decided in the case of M'Donald, 18th Dec. 1714, M. 16,808. In that case a disposition, dated subsequent to the Act of 1696, was objected to as null, because written on two sheets battered together and not sidescribed at the joining. The report bears—"The Lords sustained the nullity that the disposition produced by the pursuer as his title in this process was not sidescribed, the writ being granted after the Act of Parliament establishing the custom of sidescribing the joinings,"—that is to say, after the Act 1696, c. 15. The soundness of that decision, so far as I know, has never been questioned. The legitimate inference to be drawn from it is that if a deed written on more than one sheet be subscribed only on the last sheet it is a nullity. There can be no doubt, therefore, that if section 39 of the Act of 1874 provides, as I think it does, a remedy for the omission of subscribing each of the sheets or pages of a deed consisting of more than one sheet the remedy is one for the omission of a solemnity.

But, then, I am of opinion that it was the omission of a solemnity—and, indeed, of this very solemnity,—for which section 39 of the statute of 1874 was intended to provide, and has provided a remedy.

It would have been superfluous to have provided a remedy against trifling informalities which could not affect the validity of the deed. The statute distinctly specifies the nature of the informality to be remedied, viz., "any informality of execution;" and not contented with this, it describes this informality of execution as one in consequence of which the deed would be "deemed invalid or denied effect according to its legal import."

There is nothing startling, therefore, in the fact that the effect of the proof allowed by the statute may be to remedy the omission of a statutory solemnity. That was what the statute intended.

Not only so, but I think it must be clear, from what I have already said, that it was the omission of this very solemnity, and no other omission, which the statute contemplated might be remedied by a proof. At the date of the Act of 1874 there were only three things necessary as matter of solemnity—1st, subscribing witnesses; 2d, their designations in the deed or testing clause; 3d, the granter's subscription on each page where the deed consisted of more than one sheet. The statute does not make the omission of the first, viz., the want of subscribing witnesses, suppliable by proof. It does not make the omission of the second, viz., the designations of the witnesses in the deed or testing-clause, suppliable by proof, or, at least, not by proof merely, but by adding the designations to the signatures or subscriptions before the deed is registered or founded on in Court. The omission of the third requisite, viz., the subscription by the granter on all the sheets or pages of a deed written on more than one sheet, remains as the omission, and, in fact, the only omission or informality in the execution of the deed which the statute has said may be remedied or supplied by proof. Had it not been for that omission in this deed the present application would have been both unnecessary and incompetent. If section 39 of the statute of 1874 does not authorise the remedying of that omission by a proof, it does not, so far as I can discover, give that remedy for any omission at all.

As regards the deed now under consideration, in particular, if the first four pages had been subscribed by the granter as well as the last, it would have required no judicial application or aid from the Court to make it in all respects a probative deed. The petitioners might themselves have added, or caused to be added, the designations of the witnesses, and this application would, as I have said, have been both unnecessary and incompetent.

I do not differ from the observation which has been made that, although subscription by the granter of all the sheets or pages of a deed consisting of more than one sheet be a solemnity, the term subscription, in the language of our old statutes, has generally a peculiar application to the subscription at the end of the deed. I do not think it necessary, however, to go into that inquiry, or to rely upon the result of it. The thing to be proved is that the deed was "subscribed by the granter or maker thereof and by the witnesses." These words are, I think, used in the section in their plain and natural sense. No distinction is made in using them between the granter and the witnesses who subscribe only at the end. The section does not say or imply that the granter must sign in the full manner required by the Act 1696. It implies the reverse.

No. 174.
July 20, 1876.
M'Laren, &c. v. Menzies.

If the subscriptions to this deed be genuine, the deed is unquestionably subscribed by the granter and witnesses, and that is enough to satisfy the words of the enactment as to subscription.

I may explain that I do not think the proof competent and requisite under the statute was intended to be limited to the bare fact that the subscriptions are genuine. On the contrary, I think that the surrounding facts and circumstances attending the subscriptions both of the granter and witnesses,—everything, in short, tending to satisfy the mind of the Court that the deed was intelligently and deliberately subscribed when in the state in which it appears when submitted to the Court, may be and ought to be elicited in the proof.

And this leads me to observe that I think the petitioners acted quite rightly in not appending the designations of the witnesses to their subscriptions before presenting this application, because it was very desirable that the Court should see the deed, untouched, in the state in which it was left by the testatrix. Whether it would have been equally safe to have produced and founded on it in an action, properly so called, before adding the designations, is a different matter, on which I do not enter. But I do not look upon the production of the deed along with and for the purposes of this petition as a founding upon it in Court in the sense of section 38 of the statute; and if your Lordships grant the prayer of the petition I presume it will be open to the petitioners to add or cause to be added the designations of the witnesses in the same way as they could have done before this petition was presented.

As regards the proof now before us relative to the deed in question I have only to say that, to my mind, nothing could be more satisfactory; and I am therefore, upon the whole, of opinion that the prayer of the petition ought to be granted.

Lord Neaves—I regret that I am unable to concur in the opinion that has been delivered. I regret it because I think it desirable that a case of this kind, involving important interests, and making an undoubted change in the law, should be decided unanimously. I have, however, a different opinion on the case, and although I necessarily feel a certain distrust of my own judgment, from the fact that the judgment is not to be unanimous, I consider it to be due to the parties and to the law, as well as to myself, to state the opinion which I have arrived at.

I am of opinion that under the terms of this Act, and clause 39 in particular, it is not competent for the Court to interfere in the manner they are asked to do. I do not think it will be necessary to take up much time in stating the grounds of my opinion, which are simple, and will be, I hope, easily understood, whatever view may be taken of their validity. No doubt a great deal has been done to smooth away the difficulties, and the snares, as they have been sometimes thought, that surrounded the conveyancer's path in getting deeds executed, but at the same time I think this is one of the strongest things that has yet been done; for, as I understand it, it comes to this, as explained by my brother who has preceded me, that if there be a sheet of paper or a scrap of paper containing a man's signature, with nothing above it but a word or a line, and unprincipled persons be got to prefix to it, and allege that he prefixed to it, any number of sheets or pages containing a disposition or conveyance or disposal of his whole estate, of whatever extent or amount, both heritable and moveable, to the prejudice of all other claims upon it, while the line or portion of writing subscribed has no bearing or character of any kind at all to indicate what the intention of the party was, that shall be supplied by parole testimony—by the evidence of two witnesses that this last page, consisting of a single line, however informal or unimportant, is the concluding page of one or two or twenty preceding pages, which they will prove by parole to have been the deed which the party meant to frame or meant to authenticate by his signature upon the last piece of paper. That is a startling result, and a great change from the original law. I do not dispute that the Legislature is entitled to make changes. The Legislature is entitled to do much—it has almost unlimited powers. It has even the power to do what is wrong, and we are bound to obey it; but it is a great change to say that the will of a testator as to heritage or as to moveables may be set up entirely by parole testimony, for it comes to that. It is the next thing to making a nuncupative will. There may be no writing that the party ever saw that contains his will, provided two unprincipled or stupid men can be got to say that it preceded a piece of paper on which his name stands.

No. 174.
July 20, 1876.
M'Laren, &c. v. Menzies.

Now, what are the grounds on which this is said to be effected? It is based on the 39th section of the Act of Parliament, for I do not find anything in the 38th section that has much bearing on this matter. The 39th section is a peculiar clause, and is not very happily framed, I think, nor very harmonious in all respects. It is a negative clause. It provides that "no deed, instrument, or writing, subscribed by the granter or maker thereof, and bearing to be attested by two witnesses subscribing, and whether relating to land or not, shall be deemed invalid or denied effect according to its legal import because of any informality of execution, but the burden of proving that such deed, instrument, or writing so attested was subscribed by the granter or maker thereof, and by the witnesses by whom such deed, instrument, or writing bears to be attested, shall lie upon the party using or upholding the same; and such proof may be led in any action or proceeding in which such deed, instrument, or writing is founded on or objected to, or in a special application to the Court of Session, or to the Sheriff within whose jurisdiction the defender in any such application resides, to have it declared that such deed, instrument, or writing was subscribed by such granter or maker and witnesses." The clause has rather a peculiar commencement—"No deed, instrument, or writing subscribed by the granter or maker." That seems to be the condition of the enactment being applicable at all, —that is to say, the deed must be subscribed by the granter or maker before we know anything about it. Why that expression is used as contrasted with the next expression about the witnesses I do not quite understand; but it requires, as a condition precedent of dealing with the thing at all, that it shall be subscribed by the granter or maker thereof; and when we come to the witnesses, which are all-essential, it says—"And bearing to be attested by two witnesses." It is not to bear merely that it is subscribed by the granter. It must bear to be attested by two witnesses. But it must be subscribed by the granter. I do not understand the meaning of that difference of expression, or whether it has any meaning.

But the main point that appears to me to be involved in this question is this —there having been no previous enactment in this section that I have heard founded upon with regard to subscription, is it or is it not to be held in this important and serious question that the words "no deed, instrument, or writing subscribed by the granter or maker thereof" mean subscribed in the manner in which they are subscribed at present? No new manner of subscription is prescribed. No change as to that is indicated that I can see; but this clause

No. 174.

July 20, 1876.
M'Laren, &c.
v. Menzies.

is to deal with deeds that are subscribed by the maker or granter thereof, and without that you cannot proceed to apply the clause at all. Does that mean subscribing in some new way, or does it mean subscribing as at present? That raises the question, on which I do not mean to say there is not room for difference of opinion, whether the word "subscribed" means simply subscribed—written on the last page of the deed. Now, I can scarcely think that without further explanation the subscribing of a deed by a granter is not the subscribing of it in the way which the law at the time when you speak of it requires it to be done. There is no change of subscription made here. The subscription is the known form of subscription that exists at this time as recognised by law. It is said that subscription only applies to the last page. In its strict etymological meaning, no doubt, subscribing means writing under something else; but it does not mean only that. When you speak of the subscription of the granter of a deed you legitimately mean the whole of his subscriptions that are required by law, and that constitute the total expression of his consent. It is said it can only mean the subscription on the last page, because the witnesses subscribe, and they only subscribe the last page. But if my view is right, that this clause assumes subscription of the deed under consideration as at present, that explains the whole thing. The party is to subscribe as at present, and the witnesses are to subscribe as at present. It happens that the established custom is that witnesses subscribe on the last page, because few witnesses know or ought to know the contents of the deed. Their business is merely to see and attest the subscription. But if you speak of subscription by parties according to the law or practice at present used, that implies a subscription not of every page, but of every independent portion of the deed, which, being separable from the rest, requires separate authentication. The purpose of this Act is said to be to do away with all that, and that one signature at the end of the deed upon a sheet of letter paper may be held to authenticate ever so many pages before, without a scrap to shew the writer's cognisance or knowledge of them, or that they have even passed through his hands, or have existed before the time they are brought into Court. That is the result of trusting everything to parole testimony. No doubt if we were living in the Golden Age, when people may not require to make their wills, or if our Courts of justice were held in that fabled mansion which was called the Palace of Truth, where every one who entered was compelled, nolens volens, to speak the truth, we might be sure that we would get at the truth. No doubt the powers of cross-examination are very great, and on the other side of the island they have been accustomed to use them. I am far from saying one word against this will on the proof which has been led about it, but the case must be decided on general grounds, and there are parts of Europe and of the world where truth may not be much valued. There is a well known case of a man who was sued by a Neapolitan for a money debt, and his defence was that he had never got the loan, and that he had never seen the money; but he was obliged to leave the place and to trust his defence to a friend. He came back and found that he had gained his case, and he asked his friend how it had been gained, saying, "Of course you shewed that I never borrowed the money?" "Oh no," said the friend, "The plaintiff got two men who swore that you received the money, and I brought other two to say that they saw you pay it back." Now, where truth of this kind is for sale, it becomes dangerous to place much reliance upon parole testimony. Considerations of that kind make one alive to the importance and the risk of such things. Of course if it is the wish of the Legislature, it must be obeyed. But if such a change in the law and practice had been meant, how very easy it would have been to say "no deed, instrument, or writing, subscribed by the granter or maker thereof on the last page thereof." The change would then have been more on the face of the Act, and one would have seen precisely what was meant. But the word "subscribed" is used, and that gives rise to the doubt whether it means that the granter is to subscribe as at present, just as the witnesses are to subscribe as at present, the difference between the two being that the granter subscribes on every page or separable sheet in order to prove his consent to the whole deed, whereas the witnesses subscribe on the last page only to shew that they attest the deed.

These are the grounds upon which I proceed. I do not say that there may not be ambiguities in regard to the use of the word signing or subscribing; I merely say that it would not be straining the words of the Act to hold that subscribing the deed without further qualification means subscribing as at present. The change is introduced of providing that the attestation may be dispensed with so far, provided that the fact can be proved, but the fact to be proved is, in my opinion, the fact of subscription by the several parties who are to subscribe according to their different functions as the law now requires. If so, this seems to me to be fatal to the application of the statute which is now proposed, and which would operate an entire change in the law by making it possible to get a couple of witnesses to prove anything whatever that can be prefixed to a man's signature on a single piece of paper.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I concur with both your Lordships who have given your opinions that the question in this case is a very important one, relating as it does to the execution of deeds, and the true interpretation of the 39th section of the recent Act, the 37th and 38th Vict. cap. 93, entituled an Act "to amend the law relating to land rights and conveyancing, and to facilitate the transfer of land in Scotland."

The petitioners have presented the present application to the Court in order to allow them a proof of their averments, and thereafter to find and declare that the paper or writing referred to by them as the last will of Miss Norton was subscribed by that lady as maker thereof, and by three other persons as attesting her subscription.

But, while such is the prayer of the petition, it is at the same time stated and admitted by the petitioners that the alleged will, although written on two sheets of paper, and consisting of five pages, exclusive of the attestation, which is written partly on the fifth and following page, bears the subscription of the testator on the fifth page only. And it is also stated, and is the fact, that although the subscription bears to be attested by three witnesses subscribing, they are not designed.

A proof having been allowed to the petitioners before answer, it has been adduced, and is now before the Court. I do not understand it to be denied that the proof is sufficient, provided that the Act referred to is applicable to such a case as the present, or, in other words, provided the defects to which the alleged will is, as it stands, undoubtedly subject, are capable of being remedied under the Act referred to.

On the one hand it was contended for the petitioners that it is enough to entitle them to the benefit of the Act that the alleged will was subscribed by

No. 174.
July 20, 1876.
M'Laren, &c. v. Menzies.

the testatrix at the end of it, on the fifth page, although not subscribed at all by her on the preceding pages; while, on the other hand, it was contended by the respondents that in consequence of the non-subscription of the testatrix on the first four pages of the will it could not be said to be "a deed, instrument, or writing subscribed by the granter or maker thereof," and was therefore incapable of being validated under the Act.

By the 39th section of the Act it is provided that "no deed, instrument, or writing subscribed by the granter or maker thereof, and bearing to be attested by two witnesses subscribing, and whether relating to land or not, shall be deemed invalid or denied effect according to its legal effect because of any informality of execution." The Act also provides that the burden of proving certain particulars shall lie upon the party using or upholding the deed.

Having regard to the Act as so expressed, the primary question is whether we have in the alleged will under consideration a deed, instrument, or writing bearing to be subscribed by the granter or maker thereof. It is very clear, and neither was nor could be disputed, that two sheets of paper with writing on the first five pages, but not bearing the subscription or signature of the maker at all, could not be held to be a deed, instrument, or writing subscribed by the granter or maker thereof. But it was argued that the will here in dispute must be held to come under the operation of the Act, because, although partly written on two sheets of paper, and not containing the signature or subscription of the maker on the first sheet, it was subscribed by the granter or maker at the end, on the second sheet or fifth page. The Act, however, does not so limit, at least expressly, the requisite subscription. It is quite general, to the effect that the writ must be subscribed by the maker or granter thereof. But can a deed, instrument, or writing be said to be subscribed unless it is so in the way required by law, independently of the Act, and before it was passed? The attestation of the subscription is another and different thing altogether, which will be afterwards spoken to. I am only at present dealing with the subscription of the maker; and I think it plain that it is indispensable that there should be a deed, instrument, or writing, which could be said, before the Act was passed, to be subscribed by the granter or maker thereof. The petitioners, however, maintained that let the deed, instrument, or writing consist of one or two or any greater number of sheets of paper, it was enough to admit of the application of the statute that it had the subscription of the granter or maker at the end, whether that was on the second or any subsequent sheet; while, on the other hand, it was contended by the respondents that no deed, instrument, or writing, consisting of more than one sheet, as the alleged will does, could be held to be subscribed by the granter or maker thereof unless the subscription appeared on every page of it. That the respondents are right in this contention, according to the law as it existed before the passing of the Act in question, applicable to the subscription of deeds, cannot, as it appears to me, be successfully disputed. The statute 1696, cap. 15, removes, I think, all serious doubt on the point, for, while it validates deeds written bookways, as the will here in question is, it does so only provided that "every page be marked by the number, First, Second, &c., and signed as the margins were before." And that the Act 1696 is in this respect imperative was decided by this Court, and also by the House of Lords, in the case of Thomson v. M'Crummen's Trustees (18 D. p. 470, and 31 Scot. Jur. p. 425), where it was held, without any dissent, that the omission to mark every page of a deed written by way of book upon more than one sheet was fatal to it; and in coming to that decision all the learned Judges proceeded on the assumption that an omission to sign any of the pages of a deed written upon more than one sheet of paper would be equally fatal to it as an omission to mark every page by its number. Nor does it affect the matter that it has been decided to be unnecessary to subscribe a deed written on a single sheet of paper except on the last page, because, as shewn in the report of the case of Thomson v. M'Crummen's Trustees, as disposed of in this Court (18 D. 470) it was so decided on the ground that, on a correct construction of the Act 1696, cap. 15, it did not apply to deeds written on a single sheet, but only to deeds written on more than one sheet, as the present deed is. And just as little do I think it of any importance that the word "signed" in place of the word "subscribed" is employed in the Act of 1696, seeing that the same word is used alike in reference to the signature of the maker of the deed on the last as well as the other pages. Accordingly all the writers on the subject since the Act 1696 was passed down to the present time have referred to what that Act requires, as the subscription, not the signature, of the maker on every page where there is more than one sheet, and the practice of conveyancers has also, I believe, been to give effect to the Act in that sense.

Without therefore going into the various collateral points and speculations which were adverted to at the debate, it appears to me that a "deed, instrument, or writing," as referred to in the recent statute, must be held to be such, and such only, as can be said to have been subscribed by the granter or maker thereof according to the law as it stood prior to its passing. And that this must be so is further very strongly enforced by the circumstance that while, by the 39th section of the statute it is made incumbent on the party using or upholding a deed subject to informality in its execution, to prove that it was subscribed by the granter or maker thereof, nothing is said about the necessity of proving that the pages of a deed written on more than one sheet of paper, did truly contain the will of the granter or maker, although not subscribed by him at all. In short, the terms of the 39th section of the Act, whether in the earlier or later part of it, appear to me to require,—let the informalities otherwise of the execution of a deed be what they may,—that the subscription of it by the granter or maker must be legally complete and unobjectionable.

It seemed to be argued, however, that the expression, the formalities of execution of a deed, must necessarily cover and include the subscription of it by the maker on every page except the last. I cannot entertain this view. The language of the Act may not be in all respects very distinct or precise, but I have been unable after full consideration to see how the subscription of a deed by the granter or maker thereof can be treated as anything but the all-important, substantial, and indispensable part of the execution of a deed, while the testing-clause, and the particulars usually stated therein, may be called the formalities of execution. To the latter, therefore, and not to the subscription of the deed, do I think the statute refers in speaking of the "informality of execution." Nor is it a sufficient answer to this to say that if a deed written on more than one sheet requires to be subscribed not only on the last, but every page, there would be no defect or informality left for the remedial application of sec. 39 of the statute, as every other formality is dispensed with by section 38. It appears to me that this is an entire fallacy, for, as I read section 38, and after making allowance for its dispensing power, a deed would still be invalid if the designa-

No. 174.

July 20, 1876.
M'Laren, &c.
v. Menzies.

tion of the witnesses were not added before the deed was recorded or founded on in Court. Besides, proof in support of the subscription of the maker and witnesses is requisite by section 39 of the Act, where the deed has not been formally completed so as to be otherwise probative.

The attachment of the two sheets of paper on which the alleged will is written, by seal and string, is, I think, of no consequence, for it could not be, and was not said to form, by the law of Scotland, as it existed at the passing of the Act in question, any part of the execution either in substance or form of a deed, instrument, or writing. And neither do I think it of any consequence that the Act uses the same expression subscribed or subscribing in reference to witnesses as to the granter or maker, seeing that it does not alter, but leaves exactly as it had been before, the place or places where the granter and the witnesses require to adhibit their subscriptions, viz., on each page by the former, and at the end of the attestation by the latter.

On these grounds, and for the reasons now stated, I am of opinion that the petitioners have failed to establish their case, and, therefore, that the prayer of the petition ought to be refused.

Lord Mure.—I concur with your Lordships who have preceded me in looking upon this as a very important case, and as such I have approached the consideration of it. For it relates to a will very deliberately prepared and executed in a foreign country, but which, as it is defective according to the rules of the law of Scotland in certain of the formalities of execution, must be denied effect, unless it can be supported under the provisions of the Act of Parliament on which this application is rested. The petition is founded upon the 39th section of that Act, and seeks to have it declared, after proof has been adduced of the facts relative to the execution of the will, that it was subscribed by Miss Norton, the testatrix, as maker thereof, and by the witnesses by whom it bears to be attested.

Upon the case coming into Court a proof before answer was allowed of the petitioners' averments in the above respect; and as regards the import of the proof I do not understand that there is any difference of opinion. It is proved by the party who wrote the deed that it was prepared by him according to the instructions he received from Miss Norton, that it was read over and approved of by her, and subscribed in his presence and that of the other witnesses who attest the subscription. This evidence as to the execution of the will is corroborated by that of the other attesting witnesses, and it is further proved that the document is now in the exact same condition as it was at the date of its execution. It consists of two sheets of paper, placed one within the other, and stitched together by a thread, the ends of which are fastened down upon the paper by a seal; and it is proved that this seal was impressed over the ends of the thread by Miss Norton at the time of execution. The will bears to be written on the first four, and part of the fifth pages; and it is subscribed on the fifth or last page. The words at the foot of each page distinctly connect with those on the top of the next of the pages, and there are no deletions or alterations, or marginal additions on any part of the document.

In these circumstances there can, I think, be no doubt whatever that this will is proved to be the document which Miss Norton executed in Madeira, according to the best advice she could there obtain, and in the most solemn and deliberate manner; with the intention and in the belief that her succession would be regulated by it. But it is only subscribed by her upon the fifth or last page, and as it consists of more than one sheet, and is not signed on every page, it is defective in a formality of execution, and therefore invalid, in respect of the provisions of the Act 1696, sec. 15. The substantial question, therefore, which we have now to dispose of is whether the effect of this informality is taken off, in respect of the provisions of the 39th section of the Land Transfer Act, by the proof which has been led relative to the subscription of the will?

No. 174.
July 20, 1876.
M'Laren, &c. v. Menzies.

In dealing with this question it is of importance to keep in view that the statute founded on is a remedial Act. It must, therefore, I apprehend, receive a broad and liberal construction, in order to carry out its apparent object, which seems to be to prevent deeds from being deemed invalid, and having effect denied to them because of "informality of execution;" provided it is proved that the particular deed which is in question was executed and subscribed by the granter thereof, and by the witnesses by whom it bears to be attested. Upon the general policy of this part of the statute I do not mean to offer any opinion, beyond saying that I cannot look upon it as being in any respect an unreasonable thing that the Legislature should endeavour to make provisions under which a deed, executed as this will was, should receive effect, if proved to be the deliberate act of the party by whom it was executed.

Now, the 39th section of the statute enacts, but subject to certain conditions as to proof, and the burden of the proof, that "no deed, instrument, or writing subscribed by the granter thereof, and bearing to be attested by two witnesses subscribing, shall be deemed invalid because of any informality of execution." This is the broad leading provision of the section; and looking at the matter in a general point of view, and having regard to the plain ordinary meaning of the words used, it humbly appears to me to be clear that the will here in dispute falls within these descriptive words. It bears to be subscribed by the granter or maker thereof, and to be attested by two subscribing witnesses; but it is defective because of an "informality of execution," which consists in the omission to sign the four first pages as required by the Act 1696. The statute, however, proceeds in substance to enact that such a deed shall not be invalid, if it is proved that it was subscribed by the granter, and by the witnesses by whom it bears to be attested. Now, all this has here been very clearly proved, and there is no limitation in the statute as to the kinds of informality in execution which are to be obviated by proof of subscription. The words are very broad and comprehensive,—"any informality of execution;" and I am unable to see any grounds upon which, on fair construction of this section, the informality of omitting to sign each page in its order should not be cured by distinct evidence, such as that which has been here adduced, that this will, as it now stands, was subscribed, as it bears to be, on the last page, by the maker and the attesting witnesses.

It has, however, been argued that the word "subscribed," as used in this section of the Act, does not mean subscribed in the ordinary acceptation of the expression, viz., at the end or last page, which is the usual place of subscription in almost all documents, but subscribed on every page in terms of the Act 1696. I have not been able to adopt this view. The section is not in words so limited; and, as I read it, no such construction can be put upon its provisions without inserting words which are not contained in it. If it had been the intention of the Legislature to restrict its provisions in the manner contended for, they would, I think, have done so in express terms. This might very easily have been done by inserting after the word "subscribed," in the earlier part of the clause, the words "in terms of the Act 1696," or the words "on every page." But there are no such words, and in their absence we are not, I apprehend, entitled to construe the section as if some such words had been inserted.

No. 174. July 20, 1876. M'Laren, &c. v. Menzies.

On this broad and general ground I have come to the same conclusion as Lord Deas, in whose more detailed and very clear exposition of opinion I substantially concur; and I have only to add that I am not apprehensive that any evils are likely to arise from this construction of the statute. As the law has for long been administered, the Act 1696 has been construed not to extend to deeds written on one sheet, though not signed upon the three first pages. And by this further relaxation, all that is in this respect enacted is, that a deed which is not signed on every page, even when written on more than one sheet, shall not be invalid if it bears to be subscribed by the maker, and to be attested by two witnesses; provided it is proved to the satisfaction of a competent Court that the particular deed in dispute was actually subscribed on the last page by the granter, and by the witnesses who bear to attest it. The evidence must, of course, be clear and unequivocal to the above effect, and, in my opinion, it is so in the present case.

LORD GIFFORD.—In this case, which is one of great importance and of general interest, I concur in the opinions expressed by Lord Deas and Lord Mure, and, while fully sensible of the difficulties which attend any view which may be taken of the case, I cannot say that ultimately I have felt much hesitation in coming to the conclusion that the deed in question must be held a valid and effectual deed, the whole provisions of the statute of 1874 having been fully complied with.

The statute of 1874, 37 and 38 Vict. cap. 94, is a statute of a remedial nature. Its object is to "amend the law relating to land rights and conveyancing, and to facilitate the transfer of land in Scotland," and its whole purview is to simplify the rules of conveyancing, and to dispense with the necessity of certain deeds, and with certain formalities which were previously essential in all deeds and in titles to land. In particular, the two sections of the Act which directly bear upon the present case (sections 38 and 39) are intended to give validity and effect to deeds which, under the pre-existing state of the law, would have been absolutely null and void, and the special enactment of section 39 is that no deed or writing subscribed by the granter and bearing to be attested by two witnesses subscribing shall be deemed invalid or denied effect "because of any informality of execution." I shall immediately advert to the conditions which this clause imposes, but the general object of the clause is apparent, to remove all objections founded on mere matters of formality, and to give effect to what is really the deed of the granter according to its true legal import. I think this provision is one which ought to be liberally interpreted according to the obvious spirit of the enactment, and I cannot help thinking that it would be a great misfortune if we were compelled to hold that while many of the old formalities formerly essential to deeds are dispensed with, other formalities not more important in character or in themselves are still essential, although in the fair sense of the words they are "mere formalities of execution."

It appears to me that the fair meaning of the enactment is that a deed which is in the sense of this statute subscribed by the granter, and attested by two subscribing witnesses, shall be effectual notwithstanding that in all other respects

No. 174.
July 20, 1876.
M'Laren, &c. v. Menzies.

it shall have been irregularly and informally executed. In short, the subscription of the party, whatever that may truly mean, and the subsription of two attesting witnesses, are now the only formalities essential to the validity of a deed.

It appears to me, then, that the real and the only question in the present case is whether the alleged last will and settlement of the Honourable Miss Norton now before us is, in the sense of the statute of 1874, "subscribed by the granter or maker thereof." If this question is answered in the affirmative it is admitted that all other requisites of the statute have been complied with. It is duly and sufficiently subscribed by two attesting witnesses, and the proof which has been adduced makes it absolutely indisputable that whether Miss Norton's signature on the fifth page of the deed is or is not to be held her subscription in law to the whole writing, consisting of two sheets, she certainly intended it as her subscription to the will as a whole written on both sheets, and she intended thereby to execute as her last will and settlement the whole writing now before us.

The deed consists of two sheets or pieces of paper, and the sheets are folded so that the one is placed within the other, the first two pages of the deed being thus written upon the first sheet, and the last three pages on the second or enfolded sheet. Miss Norton, the granter, signs her name or affixes her signature only upon the fifth page, that is, on the third leaf of the enfolded sheet, and thus the outer sheet and the two pages which are written thereon does not contain any signature of the granter. The two sheets, however, at the time Miss Norton signed on the fifth page, were stitched together, and the ends of the thread by which the two sheets were fastened together were brought to the fifth page and sealed on that page under the wax bearing Miss Norton's seal, and affixed by herself at the time, and thus it is said the two sheets were made physically one deed.

Now, I am not disposed to attach very much importance to the circumstance that the deed was so stitched and the ends of the thread sealed by Miss Norton. I should be sorry to raise this circumstance or some equivalent therefor into an essential requisite for the validity of such a deed. The circumstance is important, but it is only important as part of the parole proof,—that the deed, when Miss Norton put her signature on the fifth page, consisted not of one sheet, but of these two sheets which we now have, and of nothing else, but then I think this fact might have been proved without the sealed thread in any other way, provided only that it was made perfectly clear what really was the deed or writing which the granter executed, and this leaves, in my view, as the only question in the case, this question,—is Miss Norton's signature on the fifth page of the deed her subscription of the deed, that is, of the whole deed as it is now before us, in the sense of the Act of 1874?

I am of opinion that it is, and that it is not necessary under the statute of 1874 that each page of a deed shall be signed by the granter, or even that each sheet of the deed shall be so signed,—that it is enough if the granter signs at the end of the deed, provided it be made perfectly and indisputably plain by any kind of evidence, parole or written, that he intended his subscription to be the subscription of the whole deed tendered in judgment.

There is no statutory definition of the word subscription, either in the Act of 1874 or in any other statute. The word means etymologically and originally a signature, or other writing equivalent to a signature, at the foot or end of a writing, as opposed to superscription, where the signature or sign-manual was put at the beginning or top of a writing, and I do not think the word subscription has in strictness and in Scotland any other meaning than this original one.

No. 174. July 20, 1876. M'Laren, &c. v. Menzies.

Previous to the Act 1696, c. 15, deeds in Scotland were never written bookways, that is, on successive pages, like the pages of a book. They were always written on the face of a sheet or sheets of parchment or paper, the sheets being pasted together if there were more than one, and the whole deed was only subscribed at the foot or end thereof. Originally the signature or mark made by the granter was the sign of the cross, then the granter affixed his seal, and ultimately under the statute 1540 the subscription or writing of his name by the granter was required, but even then only at the foot or end of the deed where the cross or seal had formerly been in use to be affixed. The seal which subscription superseded was never affixed anywhere else than at the end of the deed. If the party could not write, the subscription of a notary or notaries for him was substituted.

If the deed consisted of more than one sheet the several sheets were pasted together, and custom introduced the practice of the granter signing across the joinings of the sheets, part of the name being written on the one sheet and part on the other. But this was not subscription, and was never called so. It was called "sidescriving," and was merely intended to authenticate the various sheets, all of which the granter subscribed by his one subscription at the end, and so subscription was always used in the singular, and, indeed, is so still, at least in strictness, and when accuracy of language is observed. It is the one act by which the granter makes the whole deed his.

The Act 1696 allowed (that is, made lawful, without prescribing) deeds to be written bookways, but it imposed as a condition of this permission that "every page be marked by the number, and signed as the margins were before," but it is remarkable that this signing of each page is not called subscription any more than the old sidescriving was called subscription. The signing of each page is put upon the same footing as the old sidescriving at the joining of each sheet—that is a mere method of attesting and of vouching that the sidescrived sheets or the signed pages are parts of the deed which the granter executes as his deed by his one and single subscription at the foot or end thereof.

It is quite true that the conditions which the Act 1696 imposed as requisites of the permission to execute deeds written bookways, have been strictly exacted as absolutely essential to the validity of a deed written bookways. Thus, in the very remarkable case of Thomson v. M'Crummen's Trustees, 1st February 1856, 18 D. 470 (H.L.), 24th March 1859, 31 Scot. Jur. 425, it was held, both by this Court and by the House of Lords that a bond written bookways was absolutely null, merely because the pages were not marked by their numbers. It is undoubted that under the law prior to 1874 a deed written bookways must, under the Act 1696, have each page or at least each sheet (for this is an open point) signed by the granter, for this is the condition imposed by that statute; but then I am of opinion that such signature was not in strict technical language the "subscription" of the granter, but the mere attestation of the separate sheets, avouching that these separate sheets really were parts of the entire deed which the maker subscribed at the end thereof, and therefore the new statute of 1874, which dispenses with all formalities of execution, dispenses with this also as an essential,—provided it be clearly proved that the whole deed was really subscribed by the granter affixing his signature as his subscription at the foot or end of the deed.

Indeed, I am of opinion that even according to the old law of Scotland, and in the strictest sense of the word, it was only the signature of the granter at the foot or end of the deed which was properly and really his subscription. All other signatures, however essential, were not subscriptions, but something else. Sometimes they were sidescribings attesting the separate sheets,—sometimes they were marginal signings attesting a marginal note or an interlineation, or, it may be, an erasure; but none of these were "subscription." And even where the signing of each page was made statutory the statute might have been complied with otherwise than by subscribing, that is, by signing, at the foot or end of each page, provided there was signing somewhere on each page, as by signing the pagination at the top of the page, or by signing a marginal note on each page bearing "this is the first page of my will," "this is the second," and so on. Surely that would have been each page signed in the very strictest reading of the Act 1696. The true subscription of the granter is his signature at the end of the deed, where in old times the granter put his cross or his seal, and without which it is not his completed deed. Other signatures were, no doubt, under our law, as it stood prior to 1874, required as "essential formalities of execution," but all these are now dispensed with by the statute of 1874, provided only it be proved that the deed as a whole was subscribed by the granter and by two attesting witnesses.

Confining attention, therefore, in the first instance, to the older statutes, that is, to the statutes prior to the Act of 1874, I think they fairly raise the distinction between signature or signing, and "subscription" strictly so called. "Subscription" is properly and in strictness the writing of his name by the granter at the foot or end of the deed as an obligatory act, making it his deed and obligation. Signature or signing, on the contrary, is the mere writing of the granter's name, anywhere, not as the act binding the granter or making the deed his, but merely for authenticating as part of the deed some separate sheet, or some marginal note, or even, it may be, some separate word which may be erased or superinduced or otherwise made doubtful or open to question.

But then comes the Act of 1874, and while it is most important to see what is the strict and proper meaning of subscription, in the sense of the older statutes, the true question is, what does "subscribed" mean in the Act of 1874, in what sense does that statute (for really that is the only statute we have directly to do with) use the word "subscribed." What is a "subscribed" deed in the sense of the statute of 1874?

It may be noticed that the statute of 1874 speaks of the subscription of the maker and the subscription of the instrumentary witnesses in the very same words, and in the same sentence. The instrumentary witnesses only sign on the last page, that is, their subscription to the deed, and it does not seem very difficult to hold that when the statute speaks of a deed subscribed by maker and by witnesses it means their subscriptions at the only place where they all subscribed, that is, at the foot or end of the deed. But still farther, the word "subscribed" has a popular and common meaning as well as a strict and technical one, and in a remedial statute like this of 1874, which is meant to give validity to deeds otherwise null, I think it not unreasonable to ask what is the popular and common meaning of "subscribed." Now, in popular language, a deed or paper or petition or memorial is subscribed by a person when it is under his

No. 174.

July 20, 1876.
M'Laren, &c.
v. Menzies.

hand, when he has put his name at the end of it, though it may consist of many pages or of many pieces of paper. The question really is, has the subscriber made the deed his by subscribing it, though he has only signed the last page? Did he so sign with the animus to make the whole deed his deed and evident? If so, he might quite rightly be said to have subscribed the deed, although he did not sign and authenticate every page. I think this is the sense in which the statute of 1874 uses the word "subscribed." I am not compelled to hold that the Act of 1874 uses the word "subscribed" in any technical and narrow sense, even if it could be shewn (which I think it cannot) that subscribed means, technically, signed on every page. I prefer holding that the Act of 1874 uses the word "subscribed" in a broader and more popular sense, as meaning "under the hand of the granter," signed at the end only, it may be, but provided always that such signature was intended as the signature of the whole deed. I am humbly of opinion that wherever a deed has been signed, although at the end only, before attesting witnesses, and it is offered to be proved that that signature was affixed, and was intended to be the subscription of the whole deed, that is a case to which the provision of the Act of 1874 directly applies.

I feel the weight of the argument that when a deed consists of many sheets, all unmarked and unsigned, and where there is only one signature at the end, there may be room for fraud in inserting one or more sheets which were not part of the deed intended to be executed by the granter, but then this is a matter on which the Court must be satisfied by the most explicit proof. Wherever there is room for suspicion or doubt as to what really was the deed or the sheets which the testator really intended to subscribe, the Court will refuse to sustain the deed. The Court will always, and rightly, exact the clearest proof upon this point, and this seems to be an ample and sufficient guarantee. It is really the only guarantee against fraud in this and in all cases. For those who would fraudulently substitute or prefix to the signed sheet any number of spurious previous sheets which the testator never saw, and never intended to form part of his will, parties who could commit that fraud might just as well forge the testator's signature or any number of signatures, and, of course, against such frauds as these the only safeguard can be the full and sifting inquiry of a Court of law. I need hardly say that in the present case there is not the shadow of a doubt that the deed exactly as it now lies before us,—I mean both the sheets of paper on which it is written,—was as a whole executed as and intended by Miss Norton to be her latter will.

On the whole, therefore, I am of opinion that this deed is, in the sense of the Act of 1874, subscribed by the granter, that sufficient proof in terms of that statute has been adduced, and that the prayer of the petition should be granted.

Lord Curriehill.—Lord Neaves has so well stated the grave importance of the present question, and the serious consequences which may flow from the decision now to be pronounced, that I shall add nothing on that point beyond expressing my entire concurrence in his remarks.

On the merits of the question I have, after most anxious consideration, arrived at the same result as Lord Neaves and Lord Ormidale. I shall shortly state the grounds of my opinion. But for the provisions of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874, the will of Miss Norton, which consists of separate sheets of paper written bookways, would beyond all doubt according to the law of Scotland have been null and void, in consequence of non-compliance with the requirements of the last three statutes which regulate the authentication of deeds. The defects—any one of which would under the law as it stood before 1874 have been fatal to the validity of the will—are the following, viz.—(1) The designation of the writer is not set forth as is required by the Act 1593, c. 179; (2) the subscribing witnesses are not named and designed in the body of the deed as is required by the Act 1681, c. 5; and (3) the granter has not signed the will on each page, and the number of pages is not specified, as is required by the Act 1696, c. 15.

No. 174.
July 20, 1876.
M'Laren, &c. v. Menzies.

Even if the document had been signed by Miss Norton on every page the other defects enumerated are such as could not have been supplied by proof. The will, therefore, would not have been probative; it could not have been allowed to make faith in judgment in its existing condition; and its authenticity could not have been established by any extrinsic proof.

The Act of 1874, however, has, by section 38, declared that the omission to design the writer or to specify the number of pages of any writing shall no longer be valid objections to its probative character, and a similar declaration is made as to the omission to name and design the witnesses in the body of the writing, or in the testing-clause, provided their designations are appended to or follow their subscriptions; and such designations may be so appended or added at any time before the writ is recorded in any register for presentation, or is founded on in any Court, and need not be written by the witnesses themselves. In the present case the will has been produced and founded on in this Court, but the designations of the witnesses have not been appended to their subscriptions and are not set forth in the deed itself or in the testing-clause, so that, although the probative character of the will cannot now be objected to in respect of the omission to name and design the writer or to specify the number of pages, it is still open to objection in respect of the omission to design the witnesses, and but for the 39th section of the Act of 1874 the prohibition in the Act 1681, c. 5, must have prevented that omission from being supplied by proof or otherwise.

But by section 39 of the recent Act it is provided—[reads]. This section of the Act is not very happily expressed, but it must be read in connection with the previous section (38), and when so read its true construction appears to me to be, that where from the omission to design the witnesses, or from failure to comply with any of the statutory solemnities of deeds not specially repealed by section 38 or by any previous statute, a writing subscribed by the granter and bearing to be attested by two witnesses subscribing, is not formally executed, the informality of the execution may be obviated by the party upholding the deed proving that the writing so bearing to be attested was in point of fact subscribed by the granter and by the witnesses. The only informality of execution which the framer of the Act appears to have had specially in view was the failure to design the witnesses, and the clause has been expressed in general terms, apparently in order to meet the case of any similar informality which, though not then present to the mind of the framer, might arise in practice. But unless the writing is subscribed by the maker, i.e., duly subscribed by him in the manner required by law at the date of the statute, I do not think that section 39 can at all avail the party upholding the writing. In short, the failure of the granter duly to subscribe the writing is not in my opinion an "informality of execution" within the sense and meaning of the section.

No. 174.

July 20, 1876.
M'Laren, &c.
v. Menzies.

It is unnecessary to refer at length to the various statutes which make the subscription of the granter essential to the authenticity of an important writ. It is enough to say that by the Act 1540, c. 117, subscription by the maker of a deed, or by notaries for a maker who cannot write, became (except in the case of crown-charters, which are authenticated by seal without subscription), and have ever since continued to be, essential for the purpose of establishing the authenticity of the deed, i.e., that it is truly the deed of the maker. Before 1696 deeds were generally written on the face of one sheet of paper or parchment, or of two or more sheets battered together at the edge. In the case of a single sheet there could be no difficulty, as the subscription of the maker was necessarily made below at the end of the writing, and where two or more sheets battered together were employed the last sheet was subscribed and the margins were sidescribed at the joinings. This was the custom before the Act 1696, c. 15. The decisions which have been referred to as shewing that sidescribing was not before that date universal or necessary are all cases in which either the material parts of the deed were contained in the sheet which was actually subscribed, or the margins were sidescribed at the joinings by one or more of the granters, sidescription by the other granters being dispensed with either because they were cautioners and the part of the deed affecting them was on the sheet subscribed, or because they were too numerous to sidescribe. In the latter case the whole of the parties in the last sheet of the deed which contained these subscriptions authorised one or more of their number to sidescribe the margins. The identity and authenticity of the whole deed was thus in all such cases ascertained and secured by each sheet of which it consisted proving the signature of one or more of the granters.

In order to obviate the inconvenience of deeds being written in the form of a roll with such battered junctions, writs were allowed to be written bookways on separate sheets stitched together. The first statute on the subject was the Act of 1672, c. 7, which dealt only with crown-charters, which were authenticated not by subscription but by seal. The recipient of the charter was allowed to take it either on one broad sheet of parchment or on several sheets written bookways, but in the latter case it was enacted that the seals should "be appended on a tie or band which is to go thorow all the leaves in the margin." As such writs were prepared and sealed by responsible public officials the prescribed mode of appending the seal effectually authenticated each sheet secured by the tie as being part of the charter, and prevented the interpolation of any spurious sheet. The next statute on the subject, 1686, c. 17, allowed sasines to be written bookways, provided the notary attested in his docquet the number of leaves, and signed each leaf along with the witnesses. And by the Act 1696, c. 15, all other writs were authorised to be written bookways, provided that every page was marked by the number First, Second, &c., "and signed as the margins were before," and that the end of the last page made mention of the number of pages, and was signed by the witnesses where witnesses were required by law. I am of opinion that this statute—although abrogated as to the pagination and mention of the number of pages by the Act 19 and 20 Vict. c. 89, and by the 38th section of the Act of 1874—remains in full force as regards the signature of the granter on each page, and of the witnesses on the last page. I think it is not a sound construction of the statute to hold that the word "sign" is here used as meaning something different from "subscribe." It certainly means "subscribing" so far as the signatures of the maker of the

No. 174.
July 20, 1876.
M'Laren, &c.
v. Menzies.

deed and of the witnesses on the last page are concerned, and I think that it means "subscribing" the other pages by the granter as the margins were signed before. It does not mean that the other pages are to be signed on the margins, but that each page is to be subscribed in every case in which, and to the same extent as, the deed, if it had been written rollways, would have been signed on the margins.

It appears to me that such full subscription is necessary to entitle a party upholding a writing to claim the benefit of the 39th section of the Act of 1874. Without the subscription or signature of the granter on every page of the deed, when it consists of more than one sheet, it cannot be said to be a deed subscribed by the granter—he has not authenticated it or adopted it as his deed. A deed in that condition is not, in my opinion, "informally executed"—it is not executed at all. And in a case like the present, where the material part of the deed, viz., the conveyance or bequest of the heritable estate, is all contained in the first or unsigned sheet, it is a deed which, if written rollways, must have had the margin sidescribed, and which, as it has been written bookways, I must hold has not been in point of fact subscribed by the granter in its most material parts.

Were the argument for the petitioners to be sustained a wide door would be opened for fraud. Take the case of a deed consisting of a dozen separate sheets —an occurrence by no means rare: Such a deed, not being a crown-charter, could not be authenticated by sealing a band passing through all the sheets. And unless each page or each sheet is authenticated by the subscription of the granter, there is no safeguard against the interpolation or substitution of spurious sheets. To allow a parole proof that the unsigned sheets were in their present condition, all stitched together and laid before and read over to or by the granter before he subscribed the last page, would, in my opinion, instead of being a safeguard, be a source of danger. Subscription of the deed and subscription alone can secure its authentication as being the deed of the maker, and subscription to be effectual must be on every page, that being, as I read the statute 1696, c. 15, a condition precedent to the validity of every deed written bookways.

How, again, are marginal additions, interlineations, and superinductions or erasures to be authenticated? Deeds containing these irregularities are, if the petitioners are right, informally executed, and it would be competent to prove by parole testimony that the writing when the testator signed the last page contained all these irregularities though none of them were mentioned in the testing-clause. Nay, more, such proof would be competent even if every page were signed by the granter, leaving the marginal notes unsigned and the interlineations and superinductions unacknowledged.

To allow such proof in any of the cases referred to would, in my opinion, be fatal to the security not only of our land rights but of all transactions requiring the interposition of formal writing for their completion. I cannot bring myself to believe that such was the intention of the Legislature in enacting section 39 of the Act of 1874, and unless the language of the statute is so clear as to compel me to do so I cannot give it a construction which must lead to such serious consequences. But as I think the construction contended for by the petitioners is not the sound or natural construction of the 39th section, I am of opinion, on the whole matter, that the will of Miss Norton has not been subscribed by her within the sense and meaning of the 39th section of the statute;

No. 174.
July 20, 1876.
M'Laren, &c. v. Menzies.

that the provisions of that section therefore do not apply to the present case; and that the prayer of the petition should be refused.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur with Lord Deas and those of your Lordships who have arrived at the same result. I so completely agree with what has been already said in that sense, and have so little to suggest in addition, that I should gladly have been relieved from doing more than intimating my concurrence; but in the balance of opinion on the bench it is perhaps right that I should shortly state the grounds of my opinion.

On the policy of the statute I have nothing to say, for if we construe its provisions rightly we are bound to assume that the construction we adopt must be beneficial to the public. I foresee none of the dangers in the future which some of your Lordships seem to anticipate. It is at least consolatory to reflect that in the case in hand the operation of the statute will give effect to the unquestionable intention of Miss Norton as to the way in which her property should be disposed of after her death, which, but for the statute, would have been unquestionably and inequitably frustrated.

There can be no question, on the proof, that Miss Norton subscribed this deed, consisting of five pages, and that the subscribing witnesses did truly attest the act of subscription. These things, as matters of fact, are established with absolute certainty. But when we are asked to find that such was the fact, the respondent, Lady Menzies, objects that this petition should be refused, because the demand is not sanctioned by the clause of the statute under which the petition is presented.

There are two objections taken to the petitioners' claim, both founded on the terms of the 39th section of the statute—First, that it does not appear on the face of this writing that the subscription of the granter covers the first and second pages of the document, seeing that this can only appear by the signature of the granter on each page, in terms of the Act 1696; and, secondly, that the deed does not appear to be subscribed at all, because under the Act 1696 no deed can be said in legal language to be subscribed which, if it be written in a roll, does not bear the signature of the granter across the joining of the sheets, or, if it be written bookways, does not bear the signature of the granter at the foot of each page.

The first of these objections is certainly formidable, namely, that which relates to the identity of the writing which appears to be subscribed. It is said that the only part of this document which appears to be subscribed is that sheet on which the granter's signature appears, and that it does not appear that the first two pages formed any part of the deed, seeing that the requisites of the statute 1696 have not been complied with. This objection is of course technical, but I have found it attended with difficulty. It is not solved by holding, as I am inclined to hold, that the signature of each page, although a solemnity, is a formality of execution in the sense of the clause, for if the view be sound, the clause is limited to informalities in the execution of deeds which appear to be subscribed, which this, it is said, does not. But, looking to the general character and object of the enactments contained in this clause and in the preceding, I think this construction much too narrow, and that mainly on the ground so clearly elucidated by Lord Deas. It seems to me that these two clauses together were intended to cover the whole of the formalities previously required in the execution of writs. Some of them are enumerated and dispensed

No. 174.
July 20, 1876.
M'Laren, &c.
v. Menzies.

with by the 38th section, leaving the deeds probative under conditions therein expressed. I think the 39th section is intended to exhaust the rest. Two of these, namely, the subscription of the deed by the granter, and the attestation by the witnesses, still remain as essential solemnities; but all the rest (and I think the provisions of the Act 1696 seem nearly, if not entirely, to comprise all the rest), while not repealed or abolished, admit of being supplied by satisfactory testimony. There is nothing unreasonable in this, or inconsistent with the general spirit of these sections, which seems to be to reduce to the narrowest limits the formalities which are to remain de solennitate, and I agree with Lord Deas in thinking that the provisions of the Act 1696, whether as regards deeds written rollways or those written bookways, are, while they are solemnities, yet, in the sense of this clause, formalities of execution capable of being supplied by proof, and almost the only defects to which the clause can apply.

On the second objection, I have much less difficulty; indeed I am prepared, without hesitation, to reject it. The contention is that the word "subscription" as used in this section comprehends the signing of the pages and the sidescribing of the sheets provided for by the statute 1696. I think that proposition is quite untenable. If the statement were merely that any deed destitute of these formalities was before this Act not duly executed, and therefore null, it would be entirely accurate. These were solemnities without doubt. But the word "subscribe" as used here—and as used in every statute and decision as applicable to the execution of writs in our law, as far as I know—means subscription as required by the Act 1540—one signature adhibited at the end, close on the termination of the deed, in token of the foregoing writ being the expression of the intention of the granter. A man subscribes a deed when he writes his name at the end of it, just as he subscribes a page when he writes his name at the end of it. But nothing is the subscription of the granter to the deed under the Act 1540 excepting one signature at the foot or end of the writ. "Subscribed" does not and cannot mean "duly executed," as it is placed in this very clause in contrast with "due execution." The Act 1696 deals with matter entirely different, and neither in words nor in the subject of it regulates the subscription of the granter to the completed deed. It regulates only his signature of the different pages, which, when signed, constitute the writ which is to be validated by the granter's subscription. I set little store on the mere expression "signature" as contrasted with that of "subscription," although the framers of these statutes knew what they were dealing with, and used accurate and precise instead of inaccurate and popular language, as some text writers seem to have done. Accordingly, there is not a word about subscription to be found in any of its provisions, whether as regards deeds written rollways or those written bookways, and nothing which can be construed to indicate on what part of the page the signature to the pages of the bookways deed is to be placed. I should be unwilling to invent a statutory solemnity of which neither statute nor decision has said a word.

But really this is wholly immaterial to the question in hand. For even supposing that the Act 1696 had required each page to be subscribed, that is, signed at the foot or end of it, which it certainly does not provide, these signatures, although subscriptions of the different pages, would be in no sense subscriptions of the deed, and neither singly nor collectively would amount to subscription of any of the things contained in it. Until the deed is subscribed at the end it is wholly without subscription. The signatures on each page only serve another but very important object which the statute so clearly sets out in its terms as to admit of no doubt whatever—[reads Act 1696, c. 15]. Its object was to enable the lieges with safety to adopt the mode of writing deeds bookways, and at the same time to provide for the safeguards in regard to deeds written rollways. These provisions were entirely directed to ensuring that the different sheets on which the deeds were written were those to which the granter's subscription applied. The statute had no other object. Accordingly, sidescribing is made matter of solemnity in deeds written in rolls, and signature of each page "as the margins were before" when the deed is written bookways. Both are on precisely the same footing; they had the same object, and are subject to the same rules. Now, no one pretends that sidescribing had any effect as subscription under the Act 1540, or could with any propriety be so called. It was a signature in a particular place specified, which not only was not, but from its nature never could be, a subscription; for one-half of the name had to be written at the bottom of one leaf, and the other half at the top of the other.

No. 174.
July 20, 1876.
M'Laren, &c. v. Menzies.

The only other remark I shall make is, that in every case in which the Act 1696 has come in question, as far as I know, its specific object, as I have described it, has been recognised. Accordingly, it was early held, and ultimately finally settled in the case of Smith v. The Bank of Scotland, July 4, 1816, F. C., that a deed written on one sheet was good although only subscribed at the end,—a result which never could have been arrived at under the words of the statute, excepting on the footing that the signature of each page was only necessary to indicate the separate parts of the writing to which the subscription applied.

Something has been said as to how far this deed or settlement has been already founded on in the sense of the 38th section of the statute, so as to make it incompetent now to add the designations of the witnesses to their subscriptions. No such matter is raised under this petition, nor has been argued before us. I wish to express no opinion on the question. I am certainly not to be understood as assenting to the proposition that this settlement has been already founded on in judgment.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"In conformity with the opinion of the majority of the seven Judges, find and declare that the said last will and testament was duly subscribed by the granter thereof, the Honourable Caroline Elizabeth Conyers Norton, and by the witnesses by whom the same bears to be attested, viz. John Holland Payne, wine merchant in Madeira, and Francis Gorbell Tabb, clerk to the Brazilian Telegraph Company at Funchal, Madeira, and Frank Burridge Foy, also clerk there to the said company: Find the petitioners entitled to expenses since the reporting of the proof, and remit," &c.

MORTON, NEILSON, & SMART, W.S.—T. & R. B. RANKEN, W.S.—Agents.

No. 175.
July 20, 1876.
Pullar and Sons v. Perth Police Commissioners.

J. PULLAR AND SONS, Pursuers.—Balfour—J. P. B. Robertson.
PERTH POLICE COMMISSIONERS, Defenders.—Fraser—Scott.

Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862, 25 and 26 Vict. cap. 101, sec. 132.—The Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862, sec. 132, enacts that, in burghs adopting the Act, "the dust," "ashes," "rubbish," &c., "within the burgh shall be and hereby are vested in the police commissioners," and that they shall cause the same to be collected from the "streets, houses, and premises" in the burgh. Held that the enactment did not apply to ashes produced in the furnaces of a manufactory. No. 175.

July 20, 1876.

Pullar and Sons v. Perth Police Commissioners.

2D DIVISION. Lord Young. I.

MESSRS J. PULLAR AND SONS, proprietors and occupants of the North British Dye-Works, Perth, raised an action on 15th November 1875 against the police commissioners of the town of Perth, appointed under the "Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862:" * They concluded (1) for declarator "that the said commissioners are bound, in terms of the 'Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862,' to collect from the pursuers' said works the whole dust, dung, ashes, rubbish, and filth (excepting always stable and byre dung) produced in the pursuers' said works, called the North British Dye-Works, in the city of Perth, including the ashes of the coal or other fuel consumed in the furnaces of said works, and to remove the same from the said works at such convenient hours and times as the said commissioners shall think proper;" (2) for a decerniture on the defenders to remove the ashes from their works; and (3) for a decerniture on the defenders to make payment of the various sums of money, amounting in all to £144, 3s. 4d., expended by them, the pursuers, in themselves removing the ashes, &c., from their works from November 1872 when the defenders ceased to remove them. The 132d section, under part iv. of the Act, entitled "Cleansing Streets," provides—"The dust, dung, ashes, rubbish, and filth (excepting always stable and byre dung) within the burgh shall be and the same are hereby vested in the commissioners, who shall have power to sell and dispose of the same as they think proper, and the money arising therefrom shall be applied to the police purposes of this Act; and the commissioners shall cause all the streets, public or private, together with the foot pavements, from time to time to be properly swept and cleansed, and all the dust, dung, ashes, rubbish, and filth to be collected from such streets, privies, sewers, cesspools, houses, or premises, and to be removed at such convenient hours and times as they shall consider proper."

The pursuers averred that up to November 1872 the defenders had collected and removed the ashes, &c., from their works, but had since refused to do so. It was further stated that the defenders collected and carried away similar ashes, &c., from other manufactories and works in the burgh, including those produced in the furnace attached to certain mechanical works belonging to the pursuers situated opposite to their dye-works.

The police commissioners lodged defences, in which they set forth sections 134, 137, and 142 of the Act, which conferred on them discretionary powers as to the mode in which they might cause proprietors to collect and deposit dust, ashes, &c., in specified places, and to clean their own premises. They also averred that the pursuers had greatly extended their works of late years, and instead of using one or two furnaces now used as many as twenty.

They also averred—"The substances which the pursuers call 'the ashes of the fuel consumed in the furnaces in operation in their works' are not manurial, and are of no saleable value, and are worthless to the defenders. Farther, they are truly not ashes at all. The principle on which the pursuers' furnaces are constructed is such that the fuel used (coal) is so completely exhausted and used up as to leave nothing but a hard flinty substance, called "clinkers" or danders, perfectly worthless for any purpose, except the bottoming of roads or the like. The pursuers themselves invariably used said clinkers for these purposes, and allowed them so to

* 25 and 26 Vict. cap. 101.

No. 175.
July 20, 1876.
Pullar and Sons v. Perth Police Commissioners.

be used by others. On a proper construction of said statute, the defenders are not thereby bound to remove worthless articles, produced in the course of the operations necessary in carrying on dye-works, tan-works, stone-yards, and works of a similar character, for the interest of private individuals, and thus to relieve these individuals of a considerable expense connected with the carrying on of their private business, in order to lay the same upon the public."

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The police commissioners of Perth are bound under the foresaid statute to collect and remove ashes and other rubbish from the pursuers' said works; and the pursuers are entitled to have decree declaring the said duty, and ordering its performance. (2) The pursuers are entitled to recover from the said commissioners the monies expended by them in consequence of the commissioners' failure to perform the said duty.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The statements of the pursuers are not relevant. (2) On a true construction of the Act founded on, the defenders are not bound to collect and remove ashes or other refuse from within private premises. (3) The defenders are not bound under the Act to collect and remove from private premises substances not manurial and without saleable value. (4) The substance produced by the pursuers' furnaces not being ashes, within the sense of the statute, the defenders should be assoilzied. (5) Under said Act, and particularly having reference to section 137, the defenders are not entitled, at the public cost, to employ scavengers to collect ashes from private premises. (6) By said Act, and particularly by section 142, private courts and other places must be kept clean by the occupiers at their own cost.

The Lord Ordinary allowed a proof, from which it appeared that the pursuers then had from twenty-five to twenty-six furnaces in constant operation, and that from thirty to thirty-five tons of ashes per week required to be removed. Evidence was led to the effect that the commissioners still continued to remove ashes from the furnaces of brewers, flax-spinners, &c., within the burgh, but in no case did the amount of rubbish exceed three or four cart-loads a-week. The assessment paid by the pursuers for police purposes amounted to £141 in 1875-6.

On 9th March 1876 the Lord Ordinary assoilzied the defenders from the conclusions of the summons.*

---

* "OPINION.—I have had considerable difficulty in arriving at a satisfactory conclusion in this case, as I have been unable to find any precedent or principle or rule of law to guide me. On the whole matter I have come to be of opinion that, subject to the qualifications which I shall state, the defenders' second plea in law is well founded. It is, 'that on a true construction of the Act founded on they are not bound to collect and remove ashes or other refuse from within private premises.' That plea, however, must be read as meaning from within the premises now in question, or others of substantially the same character, for I mean my decision to apply to these premises only, and not to lay down any rule larger than this, that in such a manufactory as the present, having regard to its character and size, the police commissioners are not, under the Act of Parliament, bound to lift and remove the refuse clinkers and ashes produced by the furnaces of the engine-houses. I do not mean to lay down any such proposition as this, that they are not bound to remove the cinders from any manufactory whatsoever. There may be manufactories of such a domestic character that the fires therein, and the ashes and cinders falling therefrom, are not, for the purposes of such a question as the present, and so far as regards the duties of the commissioners, distinguishable from the fires and ashes of ordinary dwelling-houses. But here there is an extensive dye-work, carried on in premises erected for the purpose, and there are no less than twenty-six engine furnaces now going

No. 175.
July 20, 1876.
Pullar and Sons v. Perth Police Commissioners.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—All the ashes in burgh being vested in the defenders by the 132d section of the "Police and Improvement Act, 1862," they were bound to remove them. These ashes were ashes of the nature contemplated in the statute, and such had been the view of the commissioners until recently with regard to the pursuers' ashes, and they still held that view with respect to the ashes of all the other factories in burgh. By the statute the commissioners were bound to collect and remove "ashes, rubbish, and filth" from, inter alia, "premises" in the burgh. The interpretation of the clause defined "premises" as including manufactories.* If these were, then, ashes in the sense of the statute, the mere fact of their being in large quantities could not affect the question—majus et minus non variant speciem.

Argued for the defenders;—The ashes contemplated in the statute were domestic ashes—the result of human life—not of manufactories. The clause was enacted for the purpose of "cleansing streets," and not to enable manufacturers to get rid of their refuse at the expense of the rates. As regards the definition of premises in the interpretation clause, it was evident that that definition had reference to assessments only. In England a somewhat similar question had arisen, when it had been held that "tenements" did not include manufactories.[1] Moreover, the interpretation clause also provided that the meanings there assigned to words were only to be so understood "unless there be something in the subject or context repugnant to such construction."

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The question raised in this case is one of very general importance. The action is raised by Messrs Pullar, who are dyers in the town of Perth, against the police commissioners of that burgh, to have it found that the commissioners are bound to carry away the calcined ashes produced by the furnaces maintained by the pursuers for the purposes of their trade. It is contended that the commissioners are bound to do this under section 132 of the Police Act of 1861, which section occurs in that part of the Act which relates to the cleansing of streets. That section puts on the police commissioners the duty of properly sweeping and cleansing the streets, and collecting and removing "all the dust, dung, ashes, rubbish, and filth" from "streets, privies, sewers, cesspools, houses, or premises." That dust, &c., is declared by a previous part of the section to be the property of and vested in the commissioners. The defence is simply that the section relates to ashes and rubbish which are the result there. My opinion is, that such a manufactory, looking to its character and size, is not, for the purposes of collecting and removing the clinkers and ashes falling from these numerous furnaces, within the operation of clause 132 of the Act of Parliament. I cannot in terms sustain the second plea in law as it stands, and it need hardly be altered, for I can simply pronounce absolvitor from the conclusions of the action, without any particular findings, explaining, as I have done sufficiently, that I mean only to decide the particular case, without laying down any larger principle than I have announced as necessary to cover it. Of course, as the defenders are to have absolvitor, that will carry expenses."

---

* Sec. 3. . . .—"The word 'lands' and the word 'premises' shall include all lands, springs, rights of servitude, dwelling-houses, shops, warehouses, vaults, cellars, stables, breweries, manufactories, mills, fixed or attached machinery therein, yards, places, and other heritages specified or included in the Act of the 17 and 18 Vict. chap. 91, intituled 'an Act for the Valuation of Lands and Heritages in Scotland.'"

[1] Lyndon v. Standbridge, April 27, 1857, 26 L. J., Com. Law, 386.

No. 175.

July 20, 1876. Pullar and Sons v. Perth Police Commissioners.

of the ordinary domestic habits of the population, and was never intended to apply to the products of a manufacturing process. Accordingly, the defenders, when called upon to remove these ashes, say that they are not the result of domestic life but the products of an extensive manufacturing process. It is not said that they are detrimental to any one except the pursuers themselves, or likely to become so if left. The true object of the action is to get the police commissioners to remove what the pursuers would otherwise need to remove themselves at considerable expense,—in short, to obtain a sort of subsidy which other ratepayers do not get. I am of opinion that there is no good ground for the conclusions of the summons, and I have no doubt that the defence is a good one.

The contention of the pursuers is that ashes, wherever found in "premises," belong to the police commissioners, and they are bound to remove them, and that, as in the interpretation clause of the statute, "premises" are said to include manufactories, these ashes fall under the provisions of the statute.

It is, in my opinion, extending the application of the statute too far to say that the term "ashes" is to apply to everything which is left over after the process of combustion. We all know of processes, whereby wood, or sea-weed, or other materials are subjected to combustion for the purpose of producing a valuable result, and it would be vain to contend that where such a process is conducted within burgh the result of it is vested in and belongs to the commissioners. An ingenious attempt was made in the course of the argument to draw a distinction between the case where the combustion was the object of the process, and the case where, as here, the object was only to obtain heat for some other and ulterior purpose. I do not think that, if the statute is to be held to have the meaning put upon it by the pursuers, there is room for such a distinction. The value of the article can have nothing to do with the question.

The real meaning of the word "ashes" in this statute is manifestly such ashes as according to the nature of the population in the burgh would become deleterious and offensive if left unremoved.

I do not go farther into a comparison of the clauses than to say that the clause vesting in the commissioners the property of the ashes which they are bound to remove is conclusive as regards the products of a manufacturing process. Moreover, a discretionary power is given to the police commissioners to cause proprietors to clean out areas and spaces, and if the proprietors or occupiers fail to clean them out then they are empowered to clean them out at the expense of the proprietors.

With regard to the meaning of the word "premises" in the Act I will only remark that in the interpretation-clause it is provided that certain words shall have the meanings there assigned to them, "unless there be something in the subject or context repugnant to such construction." It is then stated that "premises" shall include, inter alia, "manufactories." And most rightly, because the nuisances which it was the object of the statute to prevent may be produced in manufactories as well as elsewhere. But to apply the provision to such products as these would be repugnant to the subject and context.

In regard to the case quoted from the English Courts, I think the Judges there took the ground which I have now taken, that domestic ashes alone were intended to be affected by the Act, and not those produced in a manufacturing process. I do not go at all on the meaning of the word "premises" or "tenement." In the view I take, these are premises in the sense of the Act. But the calcined products of these furnaces are not such "ashes" as the statute contemplates. On the whole matter I am clear this action cannot be sustained.

No. 175.

July 20, 1876. Pullar and Sons v. Perth Police Commissioners.

LORD NEAVES.—I am of the same opinion. The case should be decided upon the general purport and object of the statute. In the case of a dwelling-house, it is plain that the police commissioners are bound to take away the usual ashes and refuse. Each inhabitant thus gets the benefit of the removal. But it is different when we have to deal with an extraordinary and exceptional case, where there is produced in great quantity in the course of a manufacture for the purposes of profit refuse which the manufacturer for his own convenience, and in order that he may make still more profit, or be saved from additional outlay, wishes taken away at the expense of his neighbours. These ashes do not seem a nuisance to any one except himself. It was not intended by this statute to lay a burden upon the general inhabitants, so as to compel them to remove an extraordinary accumulation of refuse of this kind. They are ashes in one sense, for the same name is applicable to things that result in various ways. The distinction lies between a product which is useful and one which is not, and between usual domestic ashes and those which are desired to be removed merely for the convenience of the manufacturer.

With regard to the interpretation-clause I am clear that the meaning of the words depends upon the context, and if the word here were read as the pursuers desire it would be contrary to the spirit of the statute.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I entirely concur with the Lord Ordinary in thinking it very difficult to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion in this case. The difficulty arises from the uncertain and ambiguous terms in which the statutory provisions affecting the disputed question are expressed.

The Lord Ordinary says that he has been influenced by the size and character of the work or manufactory in question, and after adding that for that reason he thinks the commissioners are not bound to remove the ashes, he remarks—"I do not mean to lay down any such proposition as this, that they are not bound to remove the cinders from any manufactory whatsoever. There may be manufactories of such a domestic character that the fires therein, and the ashes and cinders falling therefrom, are not, for the purposes of such a question as the present, and, so far as regards the duties of the commissioners, distinguishable from the fires and ashes of ordinary dwelling-houses." I rather think the true ground of judgment is to be found in that explanation of the Lord Ordinary. But even if this be so, I have still considerable difficulty in construing the Act of Parliament in conformity with it. The 132d section commences by vesting all the ashes and rubbish in burgh in the commissioners; and if the clause had stopped there nothing could be clearer than that they could be compelled to remove all the ashes belonging to them. But, then, the section goes on to specify the ashes which are to be removed, viz., "the dust, dung, ashes, rubbish, and filth to be collected from such streets, privies, sewers, cesspools, houses, or premises." Now, although the clause, like many more in the Act, is expressed in very loose and uncertain terms, I am inclined to think that it must be limited to premises of the nature of inhabited houses, and not large manufactories or works such as that here in question. I rather think that to some extent houses and premises are, in this clause of the Act, meant to be convertible terms. The interpretation clause, it is true, says "premises" is to include manufactories; still, when you find the word in the particular clause under consideration in juxtaposition with houses, something of the same kind must, I think, have been meant. It might, indeed, be questionable whether dye-works are a manufactory at all. Although not suggested in argument, I doubt whether washing, scouring, and dyeing-works are properly a manufactory. They are certainly not so called popularly, and they are not even so denominated in the present record. But, at any rate, I think we are entitled to construe the expression "manufactory" with reference to the context of the clause in which it is used.

No. 175.

July 20, 1876. Pullar and Sons v. Perth Police Commissioners.

With considerable difficulty therefore, and not without hesitation, I am inclined to concur in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary as he has expressed it.

LORD GIFFORD.—I entirely concur in the judgment proposed to be pronounced.

In construing the section of the Act under consideration it is necessary to look to the object of the statute. It is a police statute, intended to regulate the cleansing, lighting, and watching of burghs and populous places. The purpose of the whole statute is to secure the health, comfort, and safety of the inhabitants and residents by proper police regulations. In particular, the clauses relating to the removal of refuse or rubbish were not intended to assist or encourage manufactories, but to relieve the population of the dust, refuse, and rubbish which necessarily accumulates in a burgh.

There is a broad distinction between domestic dust, filth, and ashes, and the ashes or refuse produced by a manufacturer in the course of his trade. That makes the difference between police ashes and manufacturing ashes. The existence of this distinction seems to me to be enough for the disposal of this case, for I think that the statute provides for the removal at the public expense, that is, at the expense of the ratepayers, of what may be called domestic refuse, such as ashes from domestic fires and the ordinary residential refuse of an ordinary dwelling-house. But I think it quite clear that these provisions do not apply to the artificial refuse of whatever kind produced in the course of a manufacture. Such refuse may be very great in amount, or very noxious and injurious in its nature, and in all cases the burden and cost of the removal of such refuse must lie on the manufacturer himself. The general public are not to pay what is really part of the cost of a private manufactory.

There may be cases where it would be impossible to say whether the ashes were domestic or manufacturing; but the ashes in question in the present case, at all events, are clearly in the category of manufacturing ashes, and so out of all dispute.

THE COURT adhered.

ROBERT A. BROWN, L.A.—HILL & FERGUSSON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 176.

July 20, 1876. M'Culloch, &c. v. Kirk-Session and Heritors of Dalry.

JOHN M'CULLOCH AND OTHERS, Pursuers.—Fraser—Rhind.
THE KIRK-SESSION AND HERITORS OF THE PARISH OF DALRY, Defenders.—D.-F. Watson—M'Kie.
THE SCHOOL BOARD OF THE PARISH OF DALRY, Defenders.—Burnet.

School—Education Act, 1872, secs. 37 and 38—Transfer of School to School Board—Endowed School.—Held that the provisions of the Education Act, 1872, which prevent a school board acquiring by purchase or lease a school "erected or acquired, and maintained, or partly maintained, with funds derived from contributions or donations (whether by the members of a particular church or religious body or not) for the purpose, or authorised by the contributors or donors to be applied for the purpose of promoting education," apply only to "subscription" schools, and did not render illegal the lease to a school board of a school erected and maintained by an ancient endowment.

No. 176.

July 20, 1876.

M'Culloch, &c. v. Kirk-Session and Heritors of Dalry.

School—Trust—Higher Education.—A testator, in the 17th century, bequeathed funds "for the erection of a free grammar school, and maintenance of poor scholars, with a sufficient learned able schoolmaster that can fit them for the several universities and colleges," the school to be in or near D.

The trust-funds proved inadequate to maintain a school of the character contemplated, and there being no other school in the neighbourhood of D, the income of the trust was for time immemorial prior to the passing of the Education Act, 1872, applied to the maintenance of a school at D, which was attended by the children of the labouring classes in the district, and at which no fees were exacted.

After the passing of the Education Act, 1872, the trustees of the endowed school did not consider it advisable to maintain a separate school in competition with the school board of D, who had appointed a schoolmaster of their own; and they entered into an arrangement with the board by which the school and schoolmaster's house belonging to the trust were leased to the board for a term of years; and the trustees bound themselves during the lease to contribute to the salary of the board's schoolmaster a sum nearly equal to the income of the endowment, subject to the condition that, in addition to the elementary instruction, the higher branches of education should be taught to fit such of the scholars as might desire it for entering a university, and that poor children, or those whom the parochial board of D might recommend, should be taught without school fees. Except in the case of children whose parents were considered unable to pay fees the school board exacted the ordinary fees.

An action was raised against the trustees, in which the school board were sisted as defenders, at the instance of certain inhabitants of D, who maintained that the new arrangement was illegal, and claimed that the trustees should revert to the old system, so that they might have their children educated free of charge.

Held that in the circumstances, it being impossible to carry out the testator's intentions literally, the new arrangement was lawful and within the discretion of the trustees, subject, however, to this qualification, that the trustees were not entitled to delegate to the parochial board their right to nominate children who were to have the benefit of the endowment, which right must remain with the trustees; and that on such nomination the school board were bound, while the agreement existed, to have the children so nominated instructed in the higher as well as in the elementary branches of education, so as to fit them for one or other of the universities.

Expenses.—Both parties allowed modified expenses out of the trust-funds.

2D DIVISION. Lord Shand. R.

BY his last will and testament, and codicil thereto, both dated in the year 1639, Robert Johnston of London bequeathed the sum of £3000 sterling of lawful money of England, to be bestowed and employed upon some good godly and pious works within the realm of Scotland, in such way and manner as the Right Honourable the Lord Johnston, and Sir David Cunningham, of London, Knight and Baronet, supervisers of the said last will and testament, should in their wisdom think good.

Lord Johnston having died, the disposal of the fund devolved upon Sir David Cunningham as sole surviving "superviser," who, upon 28th October 1658, executed a "deed of declaration anent the latter will and testament of the deceased Mr Robert Johnston."

Upon the narrative given above, and upon the further narrative that the sum of £3000 could not be got in from the persons owing money to the estate of the deceased, and after appointing £500 for the maintenance of a free grammar school at Kilmaurs, in Ayrshire, the deed of declaration proceeded:—"Whereas the remainder of the said £3000 sterling, being

No. 176.

July 20, 1876. M'Culloch, &c. v. Kirk-Session and Heritors of Dalry.

£2500 sterling, some part of it may prove desperate debt, and can never be obtained, in discharge of that trust reposed in me to the glory of Almighty God, the memory of the worthy testator, and the good of posterity, I appoint, dedicate, ordain, and think good that the said remaining sum, or so much of the said £2500 sterling as can be recovered, shall be employed upon lands or annualrent, upon good security, for erection of a free grammar school, and maintenance of poor scholars, with a sufficient learned able schoolmaster that can fit them for the several universities or colleges, and the said school to be in or near the place anciently called Saint John's Claughan, within the parish of Dalry and stewartry of Kirkcudbright, in Galloway."

Administrators were nominated by Sir David Cunningham to recover the funds, and to make "orders, constitutions, laws, and foundations" for the management thereof. It appeared, however, that these persons never acted, and the kirk-session and heritors of the parish of Dalry took upon themselves the duty of recovering and administering the mortified fund. After much litigation with the debtors to Mr Johnston's estate and their representatives a portion of the funds were recovered, and a school was established at Dalry towards the close of the seventeenth century.

The way in which the trust was administered, and the circumstances which led to the present action, are thus stated in the note to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor in the present action, dated 16th February 1876:—

"The trust-property and estate consist of a schoolhouse and schoolmaster's house and garden, and adjoining property of about 12 acres in extent, and a sum of upwards of £1100, invested in three per cent consols, and which produces about £34 a-year. The ground adjoining the school subjects has been let as an agricultural subject for ten years at an annual rent of £22. The income of the trust is thus a sum of £55; and that sum, or somewhat less, if allowance be made for annual expenses of management, and repairs on the school buildings, in addition to a free house and garden, is the whole amount available to the trustees as the means of remuneration of any schoolmaster they might appoint. The trust-estate has been derived almost entirely from the fund bequeathed by Mr Johnston in 1639; but small contributions have been made to the trustees from time to time for the purposes of the trust.

"Prior to the passing of the Education Act, it appears, as stated by the pursuers, that the school at Dalry established by the heritors and kirk-session, as trustees under Mr Johnston's settlement and relative instructions, was the only school available for the inhabitants of the village of Dalry, consisting of about 600 persons. The other schools, which supplied the wants of other parts of the parish were at a distance of five miles and seven miles respectively from the village. The trustees gave the schoolmaster the free income of the trust. This afforded a very limited remuneration; for, the school being free, the only return received from the children consisted of voluntary offerings at Candlemas, amounting to about £12 annually. The schoolmaster's income was generally enlarged by his obtaining the appointments of inspector of poor and collector of rates, and the like; but over these appointments the trustees had no control. So long as there was no other means of education in the immediate neighbourhood the trustees acted on the view that it was their duty to keep up the school according to the system which had lasted for many years, although it was kept up under considerable disadvantages, from the limited means at their disposal.

"After the passing of the Education Act of 1872 the school board of the parish appointed a schoolmaster at a salary of £120 a-year, who, besides giving instruction in the elementary branches of education, has taught also Latin, Greek, French, and mathematics. They also appointed a female teacher at a salary of £60 a-year. The defenders, the trustees under Mr Johnston's settlement, have, under these circumstances, thought it proper and expedient, in the discharge of their duty, to discontinue the occupation of their school buildings by a separate master in competition with the school board. They have arranged with the board that the school and schoolmaster's house should be given up to the board on a lease of four years, which expires on 6th February 1878, at a stipulated rent of £12; and they have agreed to contribute towards the salary of the board's schoolmaster a sum of £50 annually, subject to the condition that the teaching in the school shall not be simply of an elementary character, but shall embrace those higher branches which are necessary to fit such of the scholars as may desire it for entering a university."

No. 176.
July 20, 1876.
M'Culloch, &c. v. Kirk-Session and Heritors of Dalry.

The lease, which was submitted to the Board of Education, and approved by them, contained also this condition,—"That poor children, or those whom the parochial board of Dalry recommend, shall be taught without school fees being charged for them."

The school board accordingly entered into possession of the premises so let, and charged the ordinary fees, except in the case of children whose parents were considered too poor to pay fees.

In these circumstances the present action was raised against the kirk-session and heritors, as trustees of the mortified fund, by John M'Culloch and others, inhabitants of the village of Dalry, subsisting by manual labour, who had children attending the free school at the date when it was leased to the school board. The conclusions of the summons were for declarator that the defenders were bound, now and in all time coming, to employ the funds under their management in the upholding of a free grammar school, and maintenance of free scholars in or near the village of Dalry, and that the pursuers, as inhabitants of the said village, were entitled to have their children educated free of cost at the grammar school, which the defenders were bound to maintain. There was also a conclusion for accounting, and a conclusion that "in the event of it appearing that the said funds are not sufficient for the support of a free grammar school, it ought and should be found and declared, by decree foresaid, that the kirk-session and heritors of the said parish of Dalry are bound to apply the said funds in such way and manner as our said Lords may declare and appoint; and our said Lords ought and should, in the course of the present process, declare and appoint the way and manner in which the said funds are to be applied; and the way and manner in which the said funds are to be applied having been declared and appointed by our said Lords, the kirk-session and heritors of the said parish of Dalry ought and should be decerned and ordained, by decree of our said Lords, so to apply them."

The pursuers averred that they were in poor circumstances, and that their children were "poor scholars" in the meaning of the words as contained in Sir David Cunningham's deed of declaration.

They pleaded;—(1) The kirk-session and heritors of the parish of Dalry having taken possession and assumed the management of the funds destined by the settlement of Robert Johnston, and relative declaration or appointment of Sir David Cunningham, for the support of a free school in or near the village of Dalry, they are, in pursuance of the said deeds, bound to maintain such a school, and to apply to that purpose the funds under their control. (2) In respect of the terms of the said deeds, and of immemorial usage, the adult pursuers, as inhabitants of the parish of Dalry, are entitled to have their children educated gratuitously at the free school, which falls to be maintained by the kirk-session and heritors of

No. 176.

July 20, 1876. M'Culloch, &c. v. Kirk-Session and Heritors of Dalry.

Dalry, as trustees and managers of the foresaid funds. (3) Assuming, but denying, that the funds of the trust are insufficient for the support of a free grammar school, the pursuers are entitled to decree as in that event concluded for. (4) The lease to the school board, dated 15th December 1873, is illegal and invalid.

The kirk-session and heritors stated—"The annual income of the trust is, in itself, insufficient now-a-days to keep up a school such as the donor contemplated; and the arrangement with the school board was, and is, in the opinion of the trustees, the best and most judicious way of maintaining and upholding the Endowed Grammar School of Dalry, and of fulfilling the purposes of the trust. Should the Court, however, be of opinion that the trustees have acted wrongfully and illegally in entering into said arrangements with the school board of Dalry, the trustees would respectfully solicit the Court to indicate and declare the way and manner in which the trustees are to apply the funds of the trust, so as continue and carry on the Endowed School of Dalry according to the intentions of the donor."

They pleaded;—(1) All parties interested are not called. (2) The heritors and kirk-session not being an incorporation, the conclusions of the action are incompetent, in so far as directed against them. (3) The pursuers have not libelled, and do not possess, a legal title or interest sufficient to support the present action. (5) The arrangements condescended on, and entered into with the school board of Dalry and others, for the efficient carrying on of said endowed grammar school, rendered necessary by the altered circumstances of the times, having been within the powers and discretion of the trustees, in accordance with the intentions of the donor, and lawful and expedient, the same ought not to be set aside or disturbed.

Upon the suggestion of the Lord Ordinary the school board of Dalry sisted themselves as defenders. A conclusion was then added to the summons for declarator that the agreement with the school board was invalid and illegal.

The Lord Ordinary, on 16th February 1876, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having resumed consideration of the cause, finds that the defenders' second and third pleas in law are not insisted in, and repels the same: Finds that having regard to the amount of the funds and estate now belonging to the trust administered by the defenders, the kirk-session and heritors of Dalry, as trustees and managers of the funds and estate destined for the erection of a free grammar school and maintenance of poor scholars, conform to the last will and testament of Robert Johnston of London, Esq., dated 30th September 1639, and codicil thereto, dated 12th October of the same year, and relative declaration of appointment by Sir David Cunningham, of London, Baronet, dated 28th October 1658, and also to the means of education now provided by the defenders, the school board of the parish of Dalry, under the 'Education (Scotland) Act,' 1872, the arrangement entered into between the kirk-session and heritors, as trustees foresaid and the school board in regard to the use of the school-house and schoolmaster's house and garden belonging to the said trust, and the application of the income of the trust-estate, as set forth on record, and embodied in the agreement and lease, No. 32 of process, are lawful, and within the powers and discretion of the said trustees; sustains the defenders' fifth plea in law, and assoilzies the whole defenders from the conclusion of the action, and decerns: And finds them entitled to expenses," &c.*

* "NOTE.— . . . I have come to the conclusion that the pursuers' claim and pleas are not well founded.

The pursuers reclaimed.

No. 176.

July 20, 1876.
M'Culloch, &c. v. Kirk-Session and Heritors of Dalry.

Argued for the pursuers;—(1) The kirk-session and heritors could

"The settlement of the truster, Mr Johnston, did not define the particular purpose to which the fund bequeathed by him was to be applied, but directed the money 'to be bestowed and employed upon some good godly and pious works within the realm of Scotland,' in such way and manner as the Right Honourable Lord Johnston, and Sir David Cunningham of London, Knight and Baronet, and superviser of the said last will and testament, should in their wisdom think good. Sir David Cunningham, the survivor of these two persons, by a declaration or appointment dated 28th October 1658, directed that such reversion of the funds as might be recovered from the debtors by whom it was due should be employed 'upon lands or annualrent upon good security, for the erection of a free grammar school, and maintenance of poor scholars, with a sufficient learned able schoolmaster that can fit them for the several universities and colleges; and the said school to be in or near the place anciently called St John's Claughan, within the parish of Dalry and stewartry of Kirkcudbright, in Galloway.' It has been already stated how the fund really was employed. The primary intention of the instructions just quoted evidently was not the foundation of a school at which elementary education only should be given, and to which all the children of the immediate neighbourhood should have right to resort for education free of charge. The intention was that the school should be of a higher class—a grammar school; that there should be foundationers, or scholars, 'maintained' in connection with it, and that the schoolmaster should fit these scholars for the several universities or colleges in the country. It was probably because the funds proved to be of smaller amount than was anticipated that this purpose could not be literally carried out; and the trustees, in these circumstances, seem to have exercised a fair discretion in providing such a school as they did. It appears to me, however, to be clear that if at any time the funds of the trust had become so enlarged as to enable them to establish a different and higher class of school for the benefit of a limited number of poor scholars to be trained for admission to the universities, they would have been at least entitled if not bound to provide such a school, even although this should have involved the discontinuance of the free school for elementary education which had previously existed.

"Keeping in view the general nature of the trust as now explained, it has to be next considered whether the arrangement which the trustees actually made with the school board in the altered circumstances, resulting from the passing of the Education Act, was either a violation of the provisions of that Act, or the trust under which the defenders act.

"Immediately on the passing of the statute it became the duty of the board to provide a public school which should meet the wants of the parish and village, and at which they could compel the attendance of children whose education might otherwise be neglected. The trustees thus found that the Legislature had made provision out of the public funds and local rates for the establishment of a school, which would supply, for payment of small fees, that elementary education which they, in the absence of such a provision, had for a long time thought it right to provide. The existence of such a Government school entirely altered the circumstances. If the trustees had made no change, an unfortunate competition would have arisen between a Government school, at which fees were payable, and the school maintained by the trustees, with the probable result of injuring both. Moreover, it became apparent that the purpose which the trustees had hitherto designed to serve would be equally well, if not better, performed by the public school; and it could not be regarded as a hardship on such of the parents as could afford to pay for education that they should be required to pay the small fees of the public school; while children whose parents were unable to do so would be educated at the cost of the ratepayers contributing to the poor-rates. In these circumstances I think the trustees were right in regarding it as their duty to discontinue the school on the footing on which it had been hitherto carried on, and to endeavour, with the not delegate their powers. (2) The result of putting the nomination of children in the hands of the parochial board would obviously be that the funds at their disposal, to promote that higher education which it was the object of the trust to provide.

No. 176. July 20, 1876. M'Culloch, &c. v. Kirk-Session and Heritors of Dalry.

"The arrangement into which they entered with the school board had this end in view—for while, on the one hand, the trustees gave over the school and its pertinents at an apparently small rent, and contributed £50 a-year to the school funds, on the other they stipulated, in the words of the agreement, 'that besides elementary, higher branches shall be taught in said school, to fit scholars for a university in Scotland, if there shall be scholars whose parents or guardians wish them to receive instruction therein.' This arrangement is of a temporary character only, being subject to revision and alteration at the end of four years —that is, at February 1878.

"The arrangement is objected to, first, as a violation of the Education Act, and particularly of sections 37 and 38 of that statute. The former of these sections gives power to the school board to acquire heritable property, by purchase or lease, for the erection of schools and teachers' houses, and to take leases of now existing schools and teachers' houses, and land used in connection therewith, 'not being schools, houses, and land of the description to which the provisions of this Act in the two immediately succeeding sections regarding the transference of existing schools are applicable.' The pursuers maintain that the school and its pertinents belonging to the trustees are of the description to which these succeeding sections apply; and if this were so, the lease would be one which it was beyond the power of the parties to enter into. The succeeding section (38), 'with respect to schools now existing . . . . in any parish or burgh, erected or acquired, and maintained or partly maintained with funds derived from contributions or donations (whether by the members of a particular church or religious body or not) for the purpose, or authorised by the contributors or donors to be applied for the purpose of promoting education,' enacts 'that it shall be lawful for the person or persons vested with the title of any such school, with consent of the person or persons having the administration of the trusts upon which the same is held, to transfer such school, together with the site thereof, and any land or teacher's house held or used in connection therewith, to the school board of the parish or burgh in which it is situated, to the end and effect that such school shall thereafter be under the management of such board as a public school in the same manner as any public school under the Act.' The language here used is certainly of a very general and comprehensive nature. It may fairly be maintained that it is broad enough in its terms to cover such a case as the present, and I was formerly strongly disposed to hold that it included schools and teachers' houses, which, like the present, had been erected and maintained by means of a fund originally given as a donation mortis causa. If that view were sound it would follow that while such existing schools and teachers' houses might be given over absolutely to the school board, the board would not be entitled to take them on any other terms, and so could not acquire right to them by purchase or lease. I have, however, on further consideration, become satisfied that, on a sound construction of the statute, the section (38) has not this meaning—that it does not apply to what may shortly be described as mortified or endowed schools, and applies only to that class of schools, of which a very large number existed throughout the country when the statute passed, which may be described as subscription schools, whether maintained by the members of a particular church or religious body or not. When the statute passed there was a large number of schools throughout the country, mostly in connection with particular religious denominations, which had been erected and were maintained by donations and contributions from persons living in the parish or district in which the schools existed. The effect of the statute was to make those persons liable, for the first time, to a local rate for the maintenance of new schools and schoolhouses. The purpose for which the existing schools had been erected was about to be served in a great measure, if not entirely, in most cases by the new schools, which were to be partly sup-board would nominate the children of paupers, whom they would have been otherwise bound to have educated free. This was a clear perversion ported by funds provided by Government. It was reasonable to suppose that the persons who had hitherto voluntarily maintained the existing schools would think it unnecessary longer to bear that burden, particularly as they had now become liable to pay a school rate. The schools and schoolhouses had, however, in the meantime, been dedicated to the purposes of education, and it seems to have been thought reasonable by the Legislature, that, on the one hand, this property should not be made the means of profit to the subscribers by being sold or leased to the different school boards throughout the country, but that, on the other, the subscribers should be relieved of further burdens in connection with the school property, if they were willing to give it over for the purposes of education, for which it had been previously used. Accordingly, if the subscribers to the schools, in consequence of the new arrangements of the Legislature, desired to discontinue the use of them, and so to be freed from the burden of maintenance which they had hitherto voluntarily undertaken, the statute authorised them, through the persons in the management, or a majority of not less than two-thirds of their number, to give over the property to the school board. The explanation of the prohibitive words of section 37 evidently is, that it was not thought proper that school buildings, of the nature referred to, dedicated to education, and maintained by subscriptions, and thus, so far a burden on their supporters, should become a source of profit to those who built or supported them; and it seems to have been assumed that sufficient inducement to give over many school buildings, as authorised by section 38, was to be found in the fact that another provision for education had been made, and that, generally speaking, the subscribers to voluntary schools would be obliged to contribute, as ratepayers, to the new system. It is very difficult, however, to suppose, comprehensive though the language of section 37 be, that the Legislature intended that trustees, in the administration of endowed schools throughout the country, should be entitled to divest themselves of their school buildings, with the result of defeating the trust under which these are held. If the pursuers' argument were sound, the schoolhouses and teachers' houses belonging to Heriot's trust, and similar mortifications, might be thus disposed of. Any reasonable interpretation of the statute which would avoid this result must, I think, be adopted. The schools which may lawfully be given over are those 'erected or acquired and maintained, or partly maintained, with funds derived from contributions or donations for the purpose of promoting education;' and this general description receives light from the farther expression, 'whether by the members of a particular church or other religious body.' There is no provision entitling trustees of a mortification to part with the funds or estate other than the school buildings to the board, which there would have been had the statute been intended to apply to such cases. The words used are not apt or fitting to describe properly endowed schools under the administration of trustees. The provision for the erection and maintenance of the schools referred to is stated to be 'funds derived from contributions or donations,' and these words apparently used in the plural, with design, appear properly to refer to subscription schools only, as distinguished from schools founded by a mortification. The apparent reason of the enactment, as already stated, the difficulty in supposing that it could be intended to give the trustees of proper endowed schools the power of transferring the school property, and the absence of any provision for transferring the school funds, are elements which appear to be decisive against the view maintained by the pursuers.

"Holding, therefore, that there is nothing in the Education Act to prevent the school board from taking a lease of the school under section 37 of the statute, the only other question is whether the arrangement is a violation of the defenders' trust. By section 47 of the Education Act the school board are entitled to receive property or funds for the promotion of higher education, and are bound to apply funds for that purpose if so given. For the reasons already stated, in dealing with the particular terms of the trust-deed, I am of opinion of the trust to save the ratepayers' pockets. "Poor scholar" did not mean pauper. It was a well-known expression applied to a scholar on an endowed foundation, whatever may be his social position.[1] (3) The agreement was in violation of sec. 38 of the Education Act.[2] The school board could accept as a gift, but could not purchase or lease the school. (4) If the fund was not large enough for the support of a free grammar school, it should be preserved as a nucleus which might attract future donations.

No. 176.

July 20, 1876. M'Culloch, &c. v. Kirk-Session and Heritors of Dalry.

Argued for the defenders;—With so small a fund it was impossible to carry out literally the founder's intention, which was to maintain a higher class school in which scholars should be trained for the universities, not to provide elementary education gratis for the inhabitants of a particular locality. The present arrangement was much more in accordance with the founder's intention than that which preceded it. The trustees paid an annual sum to the school board to enable them to provide higher education, which the smallness of the fund prevented them doing directly. The arrangement had received the sanction of the Board of Education, and the Court would therefore be slow to interfere.[3]

At advising, the opinion of the Court was delivered by

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case the summons, which is at the instance of certain inhabitants of Dalry against the kirk-session and heritors, contains this that the defenders, as trustees, are not bound, in the altered circumstances, to continue the maintenance of the school on the old system. They are thus left with property and funds of an extent which is not sufficient to enable them to found or maintain a separate institution to promote the higher education of poor scholars. They can only promote that general purpose by such an arrangement as they have made with the school board, and I think the general terms of that arrangement are not only within their powers and discretion, but are in accordance with the general purposes of the trust. It was maintained in the argument for the pursuers that, at all events, the arrangement made by the defenders is liable to objection, because there is no provision in favour of 'poor scholars' which would give them the advantage of such education, as it was the purpose of the trust to promote, on more favourable terms than others having ample means to pay. The agreement entered into provides 'that poor children, or those whom the parochial board of Dalry recommend, shall be taught without school fees being charged for them.' If this provision be read, as I think it fairly must be, as merely relieving the parochial board of the obligation imposed by the statute of paying for the education of children whose parents are unable to bear the expense and not even giving to the trustees themselves the power of nominating poor scholars to be educated free of charge, I think it is open to serious objection. It was not the intention of the truster to relieve the ratepayers of any obligation which might be imposed upon them by statute. At the same time, the purpose of this action, as its whole conclusions shew, was to have the free school again opened for the benefit of the whole neighbourhood, and not to state or enforce an objection to a point of detail of this nature in the agreement entered into. I do not, therefore, regard that objection as being here properly raised. At the same time the defenders will do well in considering whether now, or in any new arrangement to be made at the expiry of the existing agreement, the provision to which I have referred should not be altered to the effect of making the trustees the nominees of any poor scholars whose interests they desire to advance, so as to give them a higher education than they can otherwise obtain free of charge."

---

[1] Lewin on Trusts, ch. xxi. secs. 12, 13 (6th edn. pp. 466-7), and cases there cited.

[2] Quoted in the Lord Ordinary's note.

[3] National Society v. School Board of London, July 5, 1874, L. R. 18 Eq. 608.

No. 176.

July 20, 1876.
M'Culloch, &c. v. Kirk-Session and Heritors of Dalry.

conclusion—"And our said Lords ought and should, in the course of the present process, declare and appoint the way and manner in which the said funds are to be applied; and the way and manner in which the said funds are to be applied having been declared and appointed by our said Lords, the kirk-session and heritors of the said parish of Dalry ought and should be decerned and ordained, by decree of our said Lords, so to apply them."

The defenders also, at the close of their statement, say—"Should the Court, however, be of opinion that the trustees have acted wrongfully and illegally in entering into said arrangements with the school board of Dalry, the trustees would respectfully solicit the Court to indicate and declare the way and manner in which the trustees are to apply the funds of the trust, so as to continue and carry on the endowed school of Dalry according to the intentions of the donor."

We have had an elaborate and able argument on the whole of the arrangement made by the trustees of the fund. The result at which we have arrived is that, with one exception, no substantial objection can be taken to that arrangement. We do not think that the terms of the 38th clause of the Education Act put any restriction on the school board in regard to the particular contract which they have made with the kirk-session and heritors. We do not think that an endowed school of this kind falls under the terms of that clause. Further, we do not think that there is any breach of trust in the way in which the kirk-session and heritors propose generally to carry out the founder's intention, viz., by a payment to the school board.

But there is one part of the arrangement which not only amounts to a delegation of their powers by the trustees beyond their competency, but a delegation to persons who have or may have an interest adverse to the intentions of the truster,—I refer to that clause of the agreement by which the children who are to have the benefit of gratuitous education in the higher branches are to be nominated by the parochial board. In the first place, I think that the trustees could not put this matter out of their own control; and, in the second place, the obvious result is that the parochial board, by nominating pauper children, would substantially relieve themselves, or rather the ratepayers, from the obligation to provide elementary education for such pauper children.

Both parties have asked us to indicate our opinion as to the proper course to be followed. We think that the agreement entered into by the kirk-session and heritors with the school board should be altered by retaining the nomination of children to the benefits of the endowment in the hands of the kirk-session and heritors.

The case having been again put out, it was stated that the parties had been unable to agree upon a joint minute, the chief point in dispute being whether the kirk-session and heritors should be allowed to nominate among others the children of paupers to be educated gratuitously upon Mr Johnston's foundation. The pursuers maintained that unless it was put beyond the power of the kirk-session and heritors to nominate pauper children there would be a danger of the trust being abused in the interests of the ratepayers.

Ultimately a joint minute was adjusted, by which the parties agreed that the Court should determine the matters in dispute.

THE COURT did not consider it advisable to restrict the discretion of

No. 176.

July 20, 1876. M'Culloch, &c. v. Kirk-Session and Heritors of Dalry.

the trustees in the way contended for by the pursuers, and pronounced this interlocutor:—"In respect of the joint minute, No. 60 of process, find that the heritors and kirk-session of Dalry, acting as trustees under the will of Mr Johnston, are not entitled to delegate to the parochial board the right to nominate poor children who are to have the benefit of the endowment: Find that the nomination of such poor children must remain with the heritors and kirk-session as trustees, and that on such nomination the school board, while the agreement libelled on exists, are bound to have the poor children so nominated instructed in the higher as well as in the elemenary branches of education, so far as to fit them for one or other of the universities, and to that effect alter the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary: Quoad ultra adhere thereto; appoint the pursuers to lodge in process an account of the expenses incurred by them, and decern."

By a subsequent interlocutor, the pursuers were allowed a modified sum of £100 of expenses, and the kirk-session and heritors a similar sum of £70, out of the trust-funds, and the latter authorised to take credit for the same in their trust-accounts.*

RHIND & LINDSAY, W.S.—J. & J. MILLIGAN, W.S.—W. SCOTT STUART, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 177.

July 20, 1876.† Law v. Humphrey.

MARY LAW, Pursuer.—Lorimer.
ADAM HUMPHREY, Defender.—Mair.

Bill—Onerosity.—In an action by the drawer of a bill against the acceptor, the plea of non-onerosity is not per se a good defence.

Executor—Expenses.—Circumstances in which an executor defending an action was found personally liable in expenses, reserving his relief against the free executry estate, if any.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Aberdeenshire. M.

THE pursuer in this case brought an action in the Sheriff Court of Aberdeenshire against the defender to recover from him, as executor of the late David Humphrey, payment of a bill for £50, granted by the latter to her, in consideration, as was alleged, of the services of her illegitimate daughter, deceased, who had acted for some years as his housekeeper. The pursuer did not aver that she herself gave any consideration for the bill, which was a regular and valid document.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) No value having been given by the pursuer for the bill libelled on, or for any part of the sum specified in it, she, as drawer and holder, is not entitled to recover payment thereof from the defender. (2) The deceased David Humphrey having been under no obligation to grant said bill, and his signature having been unduly impetrated from him to it while it was in an imperfect condition, by misrepresentations as to his liability, and under improper pretences, at a time when he was of weak and facile intellect, the pursuer is further debarred from insisting in the conclusions of the present action.

The Sheriff-substitute (Comrie Thomson) allowed both parties a proof and to the pursuer a conjunct probation, and after the proof pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find it proved that the deceased Mary M'Donald,

* It was stated to the Court that the expenses incurred by the pursuers and the kirk-session and heritors respectively were about £180 and £100 respectively, but the accounts had not been taxed.

† Decided Nov. 21, 1875.

No. 177.
July 20, 1876.
Law v. Humphrey.

an illegitimate daughter of the pursuer, was for several years in the service of the late David Humphrey; that the defender is David Humphrey's executor-dative; that at the time of Mary M'Donald's death David Humphrey was due to her a considerable sum of arrears of wages; that on her deathbed she requested Humphrey to pay what was due to her to her mother, the pursuer; that David Humphrey undertook to do so; that after her death Humphrey granted to the pursuer the bill now sued for; that he did so in implement of his foresaid undertaking: Finds in point of law that the defence of 'no value' is unfounded: Finds that the defender has failed to prove that the deceased David Humphrey was facile, or that the bill in question was fraudulently impetrated from him: Therefore repels the defences: Decerns against the defender in terms of the conclusions of the summons: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses of process; allows an account," &c.*

The defender appealed to the Sheriff (Guthrie Smith), who pronounced this interlocutor:—"In respect the defender has failed to prove that the bill in question was granted without consideration, dismisses the appeal, affirms the interlocutor appealed against, and decerns."

The defender appealed.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—I have no doubt at all that the Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute are both right, but I do not agree with their grounds of judgment. According to the law of Scotland onerosity of a bill is to be assumed, and non-onerosity can only be proved by writ or oath; but it is not always a good defence. Suppose there had been no onerosity here, and David Humphrey had simply given the bill to the pursuer, her claim to it would have been just as good. The Sheriff-substitute was wrong in allowing the pursuer a proof. She required none. She was entitled to recover. And the same error runs through the whole of his interlocutor, namely, that she had to prove that she gave consideration for the bill. That is not the law of Scotland, and his reference to English cases shews how he was wrong. The law of England is quite different, and it is on this that the Sheriff-substitute founds his judgment. The Sheriff has fallen into the same mistake, because he puts his judgment on the ground

* "NOTE . . .—The genuineness of the bill, and the fact that it was truly the expression of the granter's mind, being thus established, the only other question falling to be disposed of is the defence of non-onerosity. It is true that no value was given to the acceptor of the bill by the drawer. That is to say, no services were rendered by the pursuer to the defender's author. But admittedly the pursuer's daughter was entitled to the sum in the bill, and on deathbed she desired Humphrey to pay that sum to her mother, the pursuer. He promised to do so. That promise could not be enforced in a Court of law, because the pursuer was not the representative of her deceased daughter, who was illegitimate, and died intestate. But Humphrey chose of his own free will to convert what was an imperfect obligation, binding upon him morally but not legally, into a perfect obligation, and this he did by granting the bill now in question. It seems to the Sheriff-substitute that there is here a sufficient answer to the plea of want of consideration. It has been held that value is established, although the bill was granted in implement merely of an obligation in honour, or of a debt barred by prescription, or of a natural duty, such as providing more liberally than the law requires for a wife or a child. (See Chief-Justice Mansfield's observations in Gibbs v. Merrhill, 3 Taunt. 307, and also the opinion of the Judges in Seton v. Seton, 2 Brown, Ch. Cas., 616).

"The present case seems to fall under the same category."

No. 177. July 20, 1876. Law v. Humphrey.

"in respect the defender has failed to prove that the bill in question was granted without consideration." Even if the defender had proved the want of consideration which he alleges it would have been of no use to him. If the bill was validly the deed of Humphrey that was enough. Though I do not agree in the grounds of the Sheriffs' judgment, I do in the result at which they have arrived. As regards the question of expenses, when an executor conducts a litigation reasonably he ought not to be made liable if he fails, but here I think the defences are most unreasonable, the allegations as to fraud and facility being such as the defender must have known to be untrue.

LORD DEAS.—The bill itself was all the proof required from the pursuer,—in the first instance at all events. The mere allegation of non-onerosity was not enough to change the pursuer's position as holder of the bill. The result to which the Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff have come is, however, quite right.

LORD ARDMILLAN and LORD MURE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutors of the Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff: Find that the deceased David Humphrey, of whom the defender (appellant) is executor-dative, accepted the bill sued on for £50, drawn on him by the pursuer (respondent): Find that it is not alleged that the said bill was ever retired by the said David Humphrey, or the said sum of £50 paid by him: Find that the defender has failed to prove that the said bill was obtained from the said deceased by fraud or misrepresentation or undue influence: Therefore repel the defences, and decern against the defender in terms of the conclusions of the summons: Find the defender liable personally in expenses to the pursuer, both in the inferior Court and this Court, reserving to him his relief against the free executry estate, if any: Allow accounts of these expenses to be given in," &c.

JOHN AULD, W.S.—WILLIAM OFFICER, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 178. July 20, 1876.* Thomson, &c. v. Greenock Harbour Trustees.

ALEXANDER THOMSON AND OTHERS, Pursuers.—D.-F. Watson—Trayner—Macdonald.

GREENOCK HARBOUR TRUSTEES, Defenders.—Lord-Adv. Gordon—Guthrie Smith—Wallace.

Reparation—Culpa—Harbour Trustees—Ship.—After a vessel had left its moorings in a tidal harbour the keel and bottom were found to have sustained injuries. A stone was found fixed in the mud at the spot where the vessel had rested. Held that assuming the stone had caused the injuries the harbour trustees were not liable in damages, as they had taken all reasonable means to make the harbour safe, and no fault or negligence of themselves or their servants had been established.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Craighill. M.

THIS action was brought by Alexander Thomson and others, owners of the vessel "Albatross," against the Greenock Harbour Trustees, to recover £841, 10s. 6d., being damage alleged to have been caused to the vessel by a stone having been allowed to lie in the harbour. The "Albatross" was removed by the orders of the harbour-master to a new berth in the harbour. She there took in 60 or 70 tons of coal, and was taken to the graving-dock of Messrs Caird, when it was discovered that her keel and bottom had been injured. A stone was found in the bed of the harbour

* Decided Dec. 10, 1875.

No. 178.

July 20, 1876.
Thomson, &c. v. Greenock Harbour Trustees.

at the spot where the vessel had been moored, and this was alleged to have caused the injuries.

The defenders denied that the injury had taken place in their harbour.

The defenders pleaded;—(2) The injury to the pursuers' vessel not having been sustained in the harbour of Greenock, the defenders are not liable. (3) The said injury not having been sustained through the fault or negligence of the defenders, they are entitled to absolvitor, with expenses.

A proof was led, the result of which sufficiently appears from the following interlocutor pronounced by the Lord Ordinary:—"Find as matter of fact that the pursuers have failed to prove that the injuries to their ship, the 'Albatross,' damages for which are sued for in the present action, were received in the East India Harbour at Greenock, the locus libelled in the record; in the second place, finds, separatim, as matters of fact (1) that the East India Harbour of Greenock is, and has always been, a tidal harbour; (2) that the wharf in that harbour to which the 'Albatross' was moored in July 1874, when, as the pursuers allege, the said injuries were received, was formed in the spring of 1873; (3) that after the said wharf was completed—that is to say, between the spring of 1873 and the end of August 1873—the bottom of the said harbour, to the extent of 150 feet outward and southward from the front of the said wharf, was deepened by dredging to the depth of four feet below the eight feet which previously had been the depth of water in that part of the harbour at low water of ordinary spring tides; (4) that in the course of and immediately after the close of these dredging operations the said portion of the harbour thus deepened was examined by a diver, that stones or other hard substances, if such there were, not lifted in the process of dredging, by which injury might be caused to vessels taking the ground at low water, might be discovered and removed; (5) that these dredging operations, and the subsequent examination and clearing of the bottom, were performed by experienced and efficient workmen, under the supervision of the harbour-engineer and harbour-master, who also were persons fully qualified, by reason of their shill and experience, for discharging the duties with which respectively they were entrusted, and nothing occurred in the course of the execution of the said work, or between its completion and the time when the injury to the 'Albatross' is said by the pursuers to have been received, which suggested, or was calculated to suggest, that the said work had not been properly performed, or that the said portion of the harbour in front of the said wharf was, in consequence of a stone or stones having been left upon the bottom, unsafe for the berthage of ships, or that the time had come when a renewed examination of the bottom of this part of the harbour ought, as a measure of reasonable precaution, to be ordered by the defenders; (6) that the stone by contact with and pressure upon which the said injuries to the 'Albatross' are alleged by the pursuers to have been produced is a mooring-stone, artificially prepared, and there is nothing in the proof shewing or any way indicating the time when it was lowered or thrown into the said harbour; and (7) that the presence of the said stone in the harbour was neither known to nor suspected by the defenders prior to the time when they were informed by the pursuers that the injuries, reparation of which is now sued for, had been received by the 'Albatross': Finds as matter of law that the facts being as set forth in the seven foregoing findings, the defenders, even on the assumption that the injuries received by the said ship were caused by contact with and pressure upon the said stone in the East India Harbour of Greenock, are not liable in damages, nothing constituting fault or negligence on their part having been established: Therefore sustains the defences, assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the summons,

No. 178. and decerns: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses, of which allows an account," &c.*

July 20, 1876. Thomson, &c. v. Greenock Harbour Trustees.

* "NOTE.— . . . . . 1. On the question whether the 'Albatross' was injured in the harbour of Greenock, the Lord Ordinary has experienced great difficulty in coming to a conclusion. He all along has had doubts upon the point, and he has doubts still; and it is only because these doubts remain unremoved that judgment upon this part of the case has been given against the pursuers. . . . . 2. A judgment to this effect upon the facts, so far as hitherto considered, entitles the defenders to be assoilzied, and consequently another ground was not required for the decision of the cause. But in the circumstances the Lord Ordinary has thought it due to the parties that the other defence should also be disposed of by his interlocutor. This defence is to the effect that, even were it proved that the 'Albatross' was injured when in Greenock harbour, the defenders could not be made answerable for the consequences, inasmuch as fault or negligence upon their part has not been established As to the law, there is no controversy between the parties. The pursuers cited at the debate the cases of the Mersey Docks Trustees v. Gibbs and v. Penhallow, Law Rep., 1 Eng. & Ir. App., p. 93, and the defenders admitted that the rules of liability sanctioned by these decisions were applicable to the Greenock Harbour Trust. The only question in dispute, therefore, is a question of fact—has fault or negligence been proved? The Lord Ordinary's opinion is that fault or negligence has not been proved. He thinks the defenders have shewn, in the first place, that the part of the East India Harbour at Greenock within which the 'Albatross' was berthed was dredged, examined, and cleared between February 1873 and the end of August in that year; in the second place, that the interval between the close of these operations and the time when, according to the allegations of the pursuers, the 'Albatross' was injured, was not such as, either by custom or in consequence of anything brought to the knowledge of the defenders, ought to have suggested a renewed examination of the bottom of the harbour as a reasonable precaution; and, in the third place, that the defenders neither knew, nor ought to have known, or even suspected, that a cause of danger such as the stone by which the injuries to the 'Albatross' are said to have been produced, or any other thing by which the safety of vessels using the harbour was imperilled, lay out of sight under water in the dock. Unquestionably the presence of the stone, assuming that while the 'Albatross' lay berthed it was where subsequently discovered, could have been ascertained by the defenders had men been employed to prosecute the search; but this consideration, the Lord Ordinary thinks, falls short of proof of fault or negligence on the part of the defenders. It would be an unreasonable reading of the rule sanctioned by the House of Lords to hold that to counteract possibilities there must be kept up a constant examination of the bottom of a harbour; and, failing this, should injury be caused by the presence of an unsuspected stone, the trustees, who are the administrators of its affairs and funds, shall be dealt with as guilty of fault or negligence, and as a consequence be subjected to liability for reparation of the loss which has been sustained. And yet, unless the rule shall be thus read, fault or negligence cannot on the present occasion be brought home to the defenders. Had the interval been such as, according to the usage, suggested a renewed examination as a reasonable precaution, or had anything occurred which ought to have led the defenders to suspect that there lay buried in the mud under water that which was a source of danger to shipping, their omission to do what was thus pointed out as requisite in the circumstances would have been a culpable neglect; but neither of these alternatives has been established. It is perfectly possible, and the circumstance would not be inconsistent with anything which has been proved, that the stone in question was thrown or was lowered into the water the week before, or even the day before, the 'Albatross' was berthed; and the argument for the pursuers on this part of the case involves the conclusion that though the occurrence was neither known nor suspected by the defenders the non-removal of the stone would of itself be sufficient to render the defenders liable as for fault or neglect. The Lord Ordinary is unable to accept as sound

No. 178.

July 20, 1876.
Thomson, &c. v. Greenock Harbour Trustees.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The harbour trustees were bound to make and keep the harbour safe for vessels. The owner of a vessel had no option as to the part of the harbour where he placed his vessel, but was bound to go where the harbour-master ordered. Therefore there could not be any negligence on the owners' part.[1]

The defenders argued;—It was not proved that the injuries were caused by the stone. But, assuming that the stone caused the injuries, they were not responsible, because no fault had been proved, either in the original construction of the harbour, in failure to provide proper appliances for securing the safety of vessels, or on the part of the servants of the harbour trustees.[2]

At advising,—

LORD ARDMILLAN.—One question of law is involved in this case; but the case has been treated, and I think rightly treated, in argument, as chiefly depending on questions of fact, and these questions are, I think, three in number. The first is, Was the pursuers' vessel, the "Albatross," injured in the manner alleged by the stone which was found at the bottom of the dock or berthage in the harbour of Greenock, where she lay in July 1874? The second is, Was that stone left in the dock when it was formed or extended in 1873? The third is, If not so left in the dock in 1873, have the defenders, the harbour trustees, been guilty of any carelessness or negligence after that date?

On the first of these questions I have felt the very greatest difficulty. (After going minutely into the evidence, his Lordship came to the conclusion that the preponderance of evidence was in favour of the pursuers' theory that the injury to the keel of the "Albatross" was caused by the stone; that the stone was not in the dock when it was opened in 1873, but might have been placed in the berth only a few days before the vessel came.) But then there remains, or arises, the question of law applicable to this state of the facts.

Must fault or negligence on the part of the harbour trustees be proved? and if so, has it been proved?

I have no doubt that fault or negligence on the part of the trustees or of their servants must be proved. There is no guarantee or assurance of absolute safety. It is not expressed, and it is not implied. The defenders can only be liable if fault or negligence by them or their servants has been proved. Then I think it has not been proved.

On this point, which is sufficient for judgment, my opinion is in favour of the defenders. The stone was latent—discoverable only by dredging or by divers. When it came there, or how it came there, we know not. It may have been thrown in, or carried in by the tide; and that may have been a few weeks, or a few days, or a few hours before the "Albatross" entered. No one can say. Therefore I cannot find any safe or sufficient ground for attributing fault or negligence to the defenders, either on their own part or on the part of their servants; a view of the law by which such a result would be sanctioned. There is, he thinks, nothing hitherto laid down or recognised in any of the decisions which necessitates, or rather which would warrant, the adoption of such a principle, and accordingly his judgment upon this point also is against the pursuers, and in favour of the defenders."

---

[1] Gibbs v. Liverpool Dock Trustees, Feb. 23, 1858, 27 L. J. (Exch.) 321.

[2] Winch v. Conservators of the Thames, May 13, 1874, 9 L. R. (Q. B.) 378; Parnaby v. Lancashire Canal Company, 1839, 11 Adolph. and Ellis' Reports (old series) (Q. B.) 223.

No. 178.

July 20, 1876.
Thomson, &c. v. Greenock Harbour Trustees.

and in the absence of proved fault or negligence there is no guarantee, and therefore no liability.

LORD DEAS.—This is a case of importance, and requiring all the attention it has received. There are two grounds of defence stated, and which have been given effect to by the Lord Ordinary. One is, that the injury to the vessel is not proved to have been got in this East India Harbour at Greenock; and the other is, that assuming the injury to have been got there, there was in the circumstances no liability on the harbour trustees for the damage sustained. I am of opinion with the Lord Ordinary that this second ground of defence is well founded—that is to say, that assuming the injury to have been got in that harbour, no liability in the circumstances attaches to the trustees. I hold the trustees to be liable for the fault or negligence of their servants; but the question is, whether we can say that the stone was there by the fault or negligence of the servants of the trustees? The Lord Ordinary in his interlocutor has seven findings in point of fact, which lead him to find, "as matter of law, that, the facts being as set forth in the seven foregoing findings, the defenders, even on the assumption that the injuries received by the said ship were caused by contact with and pressure upon the said stone in the East India Harbour of Greenock, are not liable in damages, nothing constituting fault or negligence on their part having been established." Now, I agree in all these seven findings, and likewise in that conclusion in point of law which the Lord Ordinary has drawn from them. It would be quite superfluous, therefore, for me to go over all the particulars which are comprehended in these findings, because I do not differ from—on the contrary, I agree with, them all—and I think the result the Lord Ordinary has come to is rightly drawn from these findings in point of fact. Everything seems to have been done that was proper to be done at the time when the solum of the harbour was lowered, and the period that elapsed from that date to the date of this injury was not so long as to have led to the necessity or propriety of overhauling the whole of it again. But the strong ground stated by the Lord Ordinary, and which I particularly concur in, for coming to that result, is that we have no proof whatever, and no presumption, as to the time when that stone got into the place in which it is said to have been, and into the position in which it is said to have caused that injury. It may have been a week or two before; it may have been a day before; it may even have got there after the ship had left the harbour and gone to the graving-dock of Mr Caird. It was not a boulder stone—not a stone that could be naturally there, and which ought therefore to have been removed. It was said that it had probably been used as a sort of mooring-stone, and very likely, from the shape of it and the ring in it, it may have been so. At all events it was an artificial stone, which may have dropped in there accidentally. It is not likely that it was put there purposely; but it may have been dropped there either immediately before the vessel arrived or immediately after the vessel left the harbour. Now, I do not see that there is any presumption in point of fact on that matter which you can apply against the trustees. It is rather for the party claiming these damages to make out his case, and if that stone was dropped in there accidentally a week or two or a day or two before the injury happened, and consequently caused that injury, I think that, assuming the trustees to be responsible for the negligence of their servants, it would be stretching the liability of the trustees to a very unreasonable length to hold that they were liable in such circumstances. That would be holding that they were liable for a thing which was nothing else than an accident. Something was said about the way in which the accident happened, but it is not necessary to say more about that than the Lord Ordinary has very well said in the note to his interlocutor. If I am right in the view I have now stated, it is not necessary to go further, for it is sufficient for the decision of the case, and so the Lord Ordinary holds it to be.

He says, however, further, that upon the whole matter he is inclined to think it not proved that the ship sustained the injury in the harbour in consequence of coming in contact with this stone, and I am disposed to agree with the Lord Ordinary in that view likewise. I think it is not satisfactorily proved. One strong ground for holding that the injury was sustained in the harbour is stated to be the fact, which appears from the evidence, that in the St Lawrence and on the voyage home there was no such material leakage observed as to lead those on board to suspect that the ship had sustained an injury. That is the main element in the evidence leading to the inference that the injury must have been got in the harbour. If there had been such a leakage when the ship was in the harbour, and before she went into the graving-dock, as to attract attention, and to cause her to be taken to the graving-dock in order to be repaired in consequence of that leakage, then the presumption would have been very strong that the injury had been got after she came into the harbour; but no such leakage was observed after she was in the harbour any more than before. On the contrary, it is distinctly proved that the vessel was taken to the graving-dock in order to be overhauled, without the slightest suspicion that she had sustained any injury in the harbour at all. That seems to me to take away a great deal of the force which otherwise would have attached to the fact that in the St Lawrence and on the voyage home there was no leakage to attract attention. Moreover, I must say I have had very great difficulty in understanding how that injury could have been caused by the stone in the position in which it is said to have been. The theory seems to be that the stone was standing upon its edge, as we see it now in Court, and it is very material to see the stone itself. Although we are not persons of skill, like the engineers who have been examined, still we are able to form some sort of opinion, like a jury, upon questions of this kind, and it is material to see the stone and what it is like. If the stone was lying flat with the ring uppermost, and if the ship was resting upon it, then it would only be a very small part of the ship that was resting on the stone. But the theory rather seems to be that the stone was standing upon its edge. The edge, however, is very narrow. It does not look like more than six or seven inches. It is not nearly so broad as the keel of the vessel, and yet, notwithstanding, it was the opinion of the engineers that if the bottom on which the stone lay was very hard, the pressure of the ship on that stone might have caused the injury. Looking to the nature of the injury, it is very difficult to comprehend how that could occur. I shall not go into particulars as to that difficulty, but I should have liked to have had opportunity of asking some questions at the engineers who say such a thing was possible before being satisfied with their conclusion. I doubt if it is much of a question of engineering skill; and coupling its improbability with the fact that there was no leakage observed in the harbour to cause suspicion, any more than there had been upon the voyage home, I cannot say that it is proved to my satisfaction that the injury was caused in that way, and by that stone. But although I would be inclined to concur with the view of the Lord Ordinary upon that matter, it is not necessary to have a strong opinion upon it, because the first view I have stated is sufficient to dispose of the case, and is the ground on which I prefer to rest my judgment.

No. 178. July 20, 1876. Thomson, &c. v. Greenock Harbour Trustees.

LORD MURE concurred.

LORD PRESIDENT.—As regards the second ground of judgment adopted by the Lord Ordinary, I quite agree with his Lordship, both in his view of the evidence and in his application of the law. Indeed, the principle of law which applies to this case is by no means doubtful. The harbour trustees of Greenock, like the managers of any other harbour, provide accommodation for shipping, and invite the masters and owners of ships to occupy that accommodation, and charge them a price for it. The obligation thence arising is not an obligation to insure against accident, but only an obligation to use reasonable diligence to prevent the occurrence of injuries to vessels. It appears to me that in the present case there is no reason whatever for imputing negligence or any other fault either to the harbour trustees or to any of their officials or servants. The dredging of this harbour, which was necessary to deepen it to the requisite extent before it could be occupied by vessels of the size which now resort there, were carried on apparently in the most thorough, complete, and perfect manner, and it is impossible for us to read the evidence applicable to the history of the case without being satisfied that the operation was both skilful and complete at the time. After the dredging had been finished, the bottom of the harbour was examined by means of divers, to see whether any stones were still remaining there, or had been brought out of the place by the dredging operation; and that examination having been carefully made, every obstruction was removed that was found still to remain there. How this stone came there nobody can explain. I am satisfied it was not there when the harbour was completed for the reception of vessels. No doubt it is there at the time when the injury is said to have been sustained by the "Albatross," but I do not think that is sufficient to infer liability against the harbour trustees. I think, on the contrary, it lies on the pursuer in such an action as this to prove, as matter of substantive fact, that there is negligence upon the part either of the harbour trustees or of some one in their employment, and in that I think the pursuers have entirely failed.

With regard to the other ground of defence, which has also been adopted by the Lord Ordinary as a ground of judgment, I think there is much more reason for hesitation; but upon the whole I am disposed to agree with the Lord Ordinary upon that point also, and come to the conclusion that the pursuers have failed to prove that the injury to the keel of the "Albatross" was sustained within the harbour of Greenock. I do not sympathise exactly with the view stated by my brother Lord Deas, that supposing that stone to be there, and the vessel to come down and rest upon that stone on her keel, the injury would not be likely to be produced. I rather think, upon the other hand, that nothing would be more likely to produce such an injury. But then I am not at all satisfied that the keel of that vessel and the stone there came in contact at all. I do not think that has been established; and therefore, upon the whole matter, I am inclined to affirm the judgment of the Lord Ordinary as it stands.

THE COURT adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and refused the reclaiming note, with additional expenses.

MASON & SMITH, S.S.C.—WILLIAM ARCHIBALD, S.S.C.—Agents.

INDEX OF MATTERS

IN VOLUME III.

Points decided in the House of Lords are printed in Italics.
See separate Indices for Cases decided in the Registration Appeal Court, p. 1239, and in the Court of Justiciary, p. 1240.

ADVOCATE.

Held that a counsel in the conduct of a cause is entitled to use his own discretion even against the instructions of his client, and that an allegation by a client that he has sustained loss in consequence is not relevant to support a claim of damages against the counsel. Batchelor v. Pattison and Mackersy, June 30, 1876, p. 914.

AGENT AND CLIENT. Ad valorem Fees.

1. Held that any person (not prohibited by the Stamp Act of 1870) may charge the same ad valorem and other fees for preparing conveyances as members of any of the incorporated societies of law-agents are entitled to charge. Aitken v. Kirk, March 15, 1876, p. 595.

Conduct of Cause.

2. Although, generally, an agent is bound to follow the instructions of his client, when the conduct of a cause is in the hands of counsel the agent is bound to act according to the directions of counsel, and will not be answerable to his client for what he does bona fide in obedience to such directions. Batchelor v. Pattison and Mackersy, June 30, 1876, p. 914.

See Fraud—Superior and Vassal, 3.

AGENT AND PRINCIPAL. Joint Stock Company—Powers of Manager.

1. The principal agent or manager of a joint stock shipping company, to whom was committed the whole management of the company's trading business at home and abroad, and who guaranteed the freight earned by the company's ships, but whose appointment did not confer an express power of drawing or accepting bills on behalf of the company, appointed a sub-agent at a port to attend to the company's business there, and, among other duties, to collect the freights payable at the port. It was the practice of the manager to draw bills upon the sub-agent in anticipation of freight to be earned by the company's ships. The bills, after being accepted by the sub-agent, were discounted by the manager, and retired at maturity by the sub-agent out of freight collected in the interval. The amount was debited to the company in accounts rendered by the sub-agent to the manager. The bills were not entered in the books kept for the company by the manager in such a way as to shew the true nature of the transaction, but this could have been discovered from the accounts rendered by the sub-agent to the manager, which were placed before the auditor of the company.

The manager ceased to hold that office while two of the bills were current, and shortly after became bankrupt. The company having refused to allow the sub-agent credit for the amount of the bills, he sued the company for the amount. Held that the manager had not authority from the company to receive and discharge payments in anticipation of freight; that the pursuer had failed to prove by the books or otherwise that the directors were aware or ought to have been aware of the course of dealing; or that in fact the proceeds of the bills had been received by the company; and that the pursuer had therefore failed to establish liability against the company. Ross, Skolfield, and Co. v. State Line Steamship Co., Nov. 17, 1875, p. 134.

AGENT AND PRINCIPAL—Continued.

Shipbroker—Commission.

2. Held that a shipbroker was not entitled to commission upon the sale of a ship, in respect that, though the seller had been introduced to the purchaser by the broker, the sale which ultimately took place was not in consequence of the broker's introduction. White v. Munro, &c., July 11, 1876, p. 1011.

See Right in Security, 1—Sale, 2—Ship, 2.

APPEAL TO THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

There is no appeal to the House of Lords from judgments of the Court of Justiciary. Mackintosh v. The Lord Advocate, March 23, 1876, H. L., p. 34.

ARRESTMENT. Malice and want of probable cause.

1. Opinions, that where arrestments have been used against the private funds of an executor upon the dependence of an action against him as executor for payment of an executry debt, the executor is entitled to damages without proving malice or want of probable cause, in respect that the arrestments are entirely without warrant. Wilson v. Mackie, Oct. 22, 1875, p. 18.

Arrestment on dependence—Expenses.

2. Arrestment is not competent on the dependence of an action of reduction in which the only pecuniary conclusion is for the expenses of process. Stafford v. M'Laurin, Nov. 20, 1875, p. 148.

Future Debt—Inhibition—Husband and Wife.

3. Where a wife had used inhibition and arrestment on the dependence of an action of separation and aliment, and had afterwards used arrestments in execution of a decree of separation and aliment, held that after payment by the husband of all debts secured by the diligence, except sums to become due for future aliment, he was entitled to have the arrestments and inhibition recalled. Symington v. Symington, Dec. 3, 1875, p. 205.

Personal Diligence Act, 1838, 1 and 2 Vict. c. 114, sec. 16.

4. Where a pursuer seeks to use arrestments in security of a future debt upon the dependence of an action he should proceed by bill setting forth that the debtor is vergens ad inopiam, or other ground for the diligence, so as to enable the defender to answer the allegation. Symington v. Symington, Dec. 3, 1875, p. 205.

Arrestment in Security.

5. It is not competent to use diligence in security of a future debt unless upon the ground that the debtor is vergens ad inopiam, or on similar grounds. Symington v. Symington, Dec. 3, 1875, p. 205.

ASSIGNATION. See Insurance, 3—Partnership, 3—Right in Security, 2.

BALLOT ACT, 1872. Municipal Election—Voter's Mark.

1. Held that, in an election under the Ballot Act, 1872, a single stroke marked by a voter opposite the name of a candicate on a ballot paper was not equivalent to a cross as required by the Act, and was a mark by which the voter might be identified. Robertson v. Adamson, July 5, 1876, p. 978.

2. Held (1), in accordance with the decision in Haswell v. Stewart, May 23, 1874, ante, vol. i. 925, that crosses on a ballot paper to the right-hand side of the candidates' names, but not within the spaces marked off for them, were in compliance with the provisions of the Ballot Act; (2), in accordance with the same decision, that crosses to the left-hand side of the candidates' names were not in compliance with the provisions of the Ballot Act; (3), that certain marks in the proper spaces, which, though not crosses, involved the use of more than a single stroke, were sufficiently in compliance with the Ballot Act, and were admissible. Robertson v. Adamson, July 5, 1876, p. 978.

BALLOT ACT, 1872—Continued.

Election of Police Commissioners—Treating.

3. Treating of voters by candidates at an election of police commissioners is not a relevant ground for setting aside the election. M'Donald v. Robertson, May 17, 1876, p. 645.

BANK. Crossed Cheque—Forgery.

In an action by the Clydesdale Bank against the Royal Bank for payment of £4800, the pursuers made the following averments:—A forged cheque for £4800 drawn in the name of a customer of the Clydesdale Bank, payable to D P or bearer, and crossed, bearing also a forged indorsation in name of D P, was cashed by a clerk of D P at the Royal Bank, of which D P was a customer. The proceeds were employed by the clerk in paying a balance due by D P on the Stock Exchange. The Royal Bank having, on the same day, presented the cheque at the Clearing House had the amount credited to their account with the Clydesdale Bank. Ten days afterwards the Clydesdale Bank discovered that the signatures of the drawer and indorser to the cheque were forged, and intimated that they would hold the Royal Bank responsible. Held that, according to the pursuer's averments, the Royal Bank had only acted as the agent of D P, and was not liable. Clydesdale Bank v. Royal Bank, March 11, 1876, p. 586.

BANKRUPTCY. Sequestration—Awarding and Recall.

1. Procedure followed where petitions for sequestration of the estates of the same debtor had been presented in the Bill-Chamber and in a Sheriff Court. Kellock v. Anderson, &c., Dec. 14, 1875, p. 239.

Trustee—Reparation.

2. An undischarged bankrupt recovered in an action a sum of damages for slander uttered subsequent to his sequestration. Held that under the 103d section of the Bankruptcy Act the sum vested in the trustee in the sequestration. Jackson v. M'Kechnie, Nov. 13, 1875, p. 130.

Claim—Foreign.

3. The estates of a firm, which had offices and carried on business both in England and Scotland, were sequestrated in Scotland. An English company claimed to be ranked in the sequestration for £65,000, as the price paid to the bankrupts under a contract of sale which they alleged to be fraudulent, and at the same time commenced proceedings against the trustee and certain other persons in the Court of Chancery in England with a view to set aside the contract and to obtain a judgment for the £65,000. The trustee rejected the claim as unfounded, and the claimants appealed, and contended that the sequestration proceedings should be sisted pending the issue of the Chancery suit, or otherwise that a dividend or dividends should be set aside to meet the amount of the claim in case it should be sustained. Held (aff. judgment of the First Division) that there were no grounds for interfering with the course of the sequestration, and that a proof of the averments on which the claim was based had been properly allowed. Phosphate Sewage Company v. Molleson, June 20, 1876, H. L., p. 77.

Cautioner—Bill of Exchange—Ranking.

4. A guaranteed payment of debts due by B to C. C, by discounting B's bills, obtained full payment of B's debt; but in consequence of B and C afterwards becoming bankrupt, the bank with whom the bills had been discounted ranked on C's estate for the full amount of the bills and obtained payment of a dividend. Held that as C's estate had not lost any part of B's debt except the dividend repaid to the bank, his trustee could not claim more under the guarantee, and that A having become bankrupt, C's trustee could be ranked on A's estate for that amount only. Anderson v. Mackinnon, March 17, 1876, p. 608.

BANKRUPTCY—Continued.

Double Ranking—Bill of Exchange.

5. A accepted bills for accommodation of B, who discounted them at a bank. A and B having become bankrupt the bank ranked on both estates for the full amount of the bills. A's trustee claimed to retain a debt due by him to B's estate as a security for the dividend on the bills paid by him on B's account to the bank on the ground that he was entitled to be reimbursed for his loss by B. Held that the bank having been already ranked on B's estate for the full amount of the bills, A's trustee could not also be ranked for the same debt, and therefore was not entitled to retain the sums due to B's estate either in security or in satisfaction. Anderson v. Mackinnon, March 17, 1876, p. 608.

Double Ranking—Bill of Exchange—Cautioner.

6. A cautioner was called on to pay a debt on failure of the principal debtor. In an accounting between the estates of the principal debtor and of the creditor who had both become bankrupt the cautioner maintained that the debtor's estate was entitled to credit for sums lost through accommodation bills discounted for behoof of the creditor. Held that as the discounting banks had already been ranked for the bills on the creditor's estate there could not be a second ranking. Anderson v. Mackinnon, March 17, 1876, p. 608.

Security—Bankruptcy Act, 1856.

7. The holder of a bill accepted by the bankrupt along with six other co-acceptors, and of a letter of guarantee of the debt granted by another person, received payment from the bankrupt after his sequestration on delivery of these documents. In an action for repayment by the trustee some months afterwards, held that an offer by the trustee to return the documents did not necessarily replace the defender in the situation in which he formerly stood so as to entitle the trustee to decree, but that inquiry must be made into the solvency of the co-acceptors and the guarantor at the date of the payment, and at the date of the offer, in order to discover whether the documents were of the same value at the latter date as at the former. Pearson v. Ferguson, Davidson, and Co., June 9, 1876, p. 800.

See Right in Security, 1—Sale, 3.

BANKRUPTCY, FRAUDULENT. See Justiciary Index, Indictment, p. 1241.

BILL. Onerosity.

In an action by the drawer of a bill against the acceptor, the plea of non-onerosity is not per se a good defence. Law v. Humphrey, July 20, 1876, p. 1192.

See Bankruptcy, 4, 5, 6, 7.

BONA FIDES. See Executor.

BONA FIDE CONSUMPTION. See Lease, 8.

BURGH. Burgh Election—Statute—Casus Improvisus.

1. In a question as to the compulsory retirement in 1875 of a town-councillor who had held office for two years only in a burgh where the number of councillors was eighteen, held (1) that the retirement annually of six councillors was imperative, although the number of those bound to retire in respect of their being longest in office was less than six, and that the deficiency fell to be made up from the class next longest in office; (2) that the Municipal Elections Act of 1870, in providing for town-councils fixing the order in which councillors should retire only in cases where councillors had been elected on the same day, without being voted for, or "by an equality of votes," had by implication recognised the rule of retirement founded on disparity of votes prescribed by the Royal Burghs Reform Act (3 and 4 Will. IV. c. 76), for the elections of 1834 and 1835 as applicable to subsequent elections; (3) that a vacancy caused by the death or resignation of a councillor who was not one bound to retire at the next annual election could not be reckoned among the vacancies required by the statute. Thomson, &c. v. Magistrates of Rutherglen, &c., Feb. 17, 1876, p. 451.

BURGH—Continued.

Sheriff—Act 20 and 21 Vict. c. 70, sec. 1—Competency of Appeal.

2. Held that a deliverrnce of a Sheriff upon a petition for the extension of the boundaries of a burgh under the statute 20 and 21 Vict. c. 70, finding that neither the boundaries described in the petition nor any others which might be within its scope satisfied the requirements of the statute, and therefore refusing the petition, was not subject to review. Dubs, &c. v. Police Commissioners of Crosshill, June 1, 1876, p. 758.

See Ballot Act—Police.

CARRIER. Notice—Judicial Inspection.

Where a consignee of goods, which have been damaged in transit, breaks bulk without notice to the carrier, or judicial inspection, he does not thereby bar his claim for damages, although the want of such precaution to preserve evidence may be an element in the proof. Johnston and Sons v. Dove, Dec. 2, 1875, p. 202.

See Proof, 2—Railway, 2, 4—Ship, 4.

CAUTIONER. See Bankruptcy, 4, 6.

CHURCH. Designation of Addition to Churchyard—Presbytery—Jurisdiction—Ecclesiastical Buildings Act, 1868, 31 and 32 Vict. c. 96, secs. 3, 14, and 20—Compulsory Sale—Notice.

1. The designation of an addition to a churchyard by the Presbytery, and the regulation of procedure thereanent, are not subject to the review of the Court of Session, who will only interfere if there be shewn to have been some violation of the ordinary rules of procedure common to all Courts whereby injustice has resulted.

Circumstances in which held, in accordance with the above, that an heritor whose land had been compulsorily taken as an addition to a churchyard, and who had not taken an appeal to the Sheriff from the Presbytery's deliverance within the days allowed by the Act 31 and 32 Vict. c. 96, was not entitled to have the proceedings set aside on the ground of want of notice. Walker, &c. v. Presbytery of Arbroath, March 1, 1876, p. 498.

Decree of Removing by Church Court.

2. Although a Presbytery has an exceptional power to enforce a decree of removing, it is usual and competent for them in designating a piece of ground for an addition to a churchyard to ordain the tenant to remove. Walker, &c. v. Presbytery of Arbroath, March 1, 1876, p. 498.

Manse—Presbytery—Expenses—Ecclesiastical Buildings Act, 1868, secs. 3 and 4.

3. A minister petitioned the Presbytery to visit his manse with a view to repairs. The Presbytery employed an architect, and pronounced findings in accordance with his report. The heritors appealed to the Sheriff under sec. 3 of the Ecclesiastical Buildings Act, 1868, and the case was ultimately disposed of on further appeal to the Lord Ordinary on Teinds. The Presbytery did not appear in the appeal, but decerned against the heritors for the amount of their architect's account, and, not receiving payment, raised an action for payment of the account, as duly incurred by them. Held that they were entitled to decree.

Observed—That the Presbytery ought not to have pronounced decree for their expenses after the case had been appealed to the Sheriff. Presbytery of Deer v. Heritors of Pitsligo, July 5, 1876, p. 975.

CHURCH—Continued.

Allocation of Area—Quoad Sacra Parish—Stat. 7 and 8 Vict. cap. 44, secs. 8 and 9.

4. The lands of certain heritors in the parish of J. were, in 1855, under the provisions of the Act of 7 and 8 Vict. sections 8 and 9, disjoined from the parish of J. quoad sacra, and, along with certain portions of other parishes, erected into a quoad sacra parish. In 1874 the parish church of J., the area of which had been for a long period divided among all the heritors of the parish according to an extrajudicial agreement, was excambed for a new church. In an application by the heritors to have the area of the new church divided by the Sheriff, held that heritors whose lands were entirely within the quoad sacra parish were not entitled to share in an allocation of the area of the new church according to their valued rent, but the question of their right to a family seat in the new church reserved. Duke of Roxburghe, &c., June 1, 1876, p. 728.

Parish Quoad Sacra—Marriage—Proclamation of Banns.

5. Held that the proclamation of banns was one of the functions and duties of the office of minister of a church erected into a parish church under the Act 7 and 8 Vict. c. 44, for the district attached thereto as a parish quoad sacra. Hutton, &c. v. Harper, &c., March 9, 1876, H. L., p. 9.

Parish Quoad Sacra.

6. In an application for disjunction and erection quoad sacra of a church and district situated wholly within a quoad sacra parish, intimation ordered both in the original and the quoad sacra parish churches. Whitelaw, &c., Nov. 8, 1875, p. 85.

COLLABORATEUR. See Reparation, 1.

COMMISSION, BROKER'S. See Agent and Principal, 2.

COMPANY. See Partnership.

COMPENSATION. See Contract—Lease, 9, 10.

CONTRACT. Compensation—Damages—Petition for Sale.

A storekeeper received a quantity of corn from a merchant to be stored. There was no written contract. After re-delivering the greater part, the storekeeper retained the remainder, and presented a petition to the Sheriff for warrant to sell it, and apply the proceeds towards payment of warehouse rent and storage charges for the corn, which the merchant refused to pay. The merchant stated as a counter claim damage to a greater amount done to the corn re-delivered, owing to the neglect of the storekeeper. The counter claim for damage having been restricted to the amount of the petitioner's claim, held that it might competently be stated as a set off, both claims being rested on stipulations of the same implied contract, and objection that it was an attempt to set off an illiquid against a liquid claim repelled.

Held that the petition for warrant to sell the respondents' goods and to appropriate the proceeds was, as regarded the plea of compensation, in the same position as a petitory action for payment of money. Gibson and Stewart v. Brown and Co., Jan. 13, 1876, p. 328.

See Lease—Proof, 1—Sale.

CRIME. See Justiciary Index, p. 1240.

CURATOR BONIS. See Foreign, 2—Judicial Factor.

DILIGENCE. Personal Diligence—Charge—Competency of second charge—Suspension.

1. A suspension of a charge was brought on the ground of irregularity in the messenger's execution. The chargers pleaded that the suspension was incompetent without a reduction of the messenger's execution. Thereafter the chargers, by letter, abandoned the charge, but insisted in the plea of incompetency in the suspension, and craved that the note should be refused, with expenses. The Court refused the suspension in so far as regarded the grounds and warrants of the charge, and, quoad ultra, sisted procedure pending an action of reduction of the messenger's execution at the instance of the suspender. The chargers then gave a second charge upon the same grounds and warrants. In a second suspension held that the first charge having been abandoned as a charge, and being only insisted in so far as the question of expenses in the first suspension was concerned, the second charge was competent. Clark v. Hamilton and Lee, Nov. 27, 1875, p. 166.

DILIGENCE—Continued.

Reincarceration.

2. Held that reincarceration of a debtor on the same diligence is legal, and that it lies upon the debtor to shew an oppressive use of such diligence to entitle him to the equitable interference of the Court. Forgie v. Stewart and M'Donald, July 20, 1876, p. 1149.

See Arrestment—Poinding the ground.

DIVISION AND SALE. Property, pro indiviso.

In an action of division and sale of a heritable property, held that, though not physically incapable of division, the estate was incapable of division with due regard to the rights and interests of parties, inasmuch as division would reduce for the time the market value of each party's share, and that a pro indiviso proprietor was therefore entitled to insist on a sale of the whole estate and division of the price.

Observed (per cur.) that in the case of sale of a pro indiviso property under the orders of the Court a power to the pro indiviso proprietors to bid at the sale might be reserved in the articles of roup. Thom, et al. v. Macbeth, et al., Nov. 26, 1875, p. 161.

DOGS ACT, 1871. Statute 34 and 35 Vict. cap. 56 (Dogs Act, 1871), sec. 2.

Held that section 2 of the "Dogs Act, 1871," was not restricted in its application to dogs dangerous to human beings. Henderson v. M'Kenzie, March 18, 1876, p. 623.

DOMICILE. See Foreign, 1.

DONATION. See Parent and Child, 1.

ELECTION. See Ballot Act—Burgh.

ENTAIL. Trust—Institute.

1. A testator conveyed his whole property to trustees, directing them to continue the trust during the life of his widow, and for at least ten years after his own death, and "after the death of my said wife, and while the trust shall continue to subsist," to pay an annuity to "the heir who would then be entitled to succeed to my lands [of A] under the destination after contained." The trustees were directed to entail the lands of A, and the destination was to the heirs whomsoever of the testator's body, whom failing, to J. R. and the heirs of his body, whom failing, to other substitutes. The testator further directed that, considering that J. R. was heir of entail presumptive to the lands of C, now in possession of the testator's wife, and that it was his intention that the estate of A should be held by a series of heirs different from those entitled to the estate of C, his trustees should insert in the deed of entail of A a condition to secure that, in the event of the succession to A opening to an heir who should be at the time proprietor of C, the right of such heir under the deed of entail to be executed should lapse as if he were naturally dead. J. R. succeeded to C by the death of the testator's wife, two years after the death of the testator. Held that he was thereby disqualified from claiming the annuity, and that it was payable to his eldest son as the heir entitled to succeed to A. Robertson v. Robertson, Dec. 17, 1875, p. 274.

Constitution of Improvement Debt.

2. By a deed of entail it was provided that the heir of entail in possession should be a creditor of the succeeding heirs for three-fourths of any sums expended in improvements of a certain kind, but it was declared that the executors of the person making such should have no right to repayment unless "he shall, by some probative writing under his hand, have expressly declared or signified his intention that a share of the improvement expenditure should form a charge against the succeeding heirs of entail."

ENTAIL—Continued.

Circumstances in which held that a deceased heir under the entail had by his settlement effectually signified his intention that his trustees should be creditors for an improvement debt which he was in the course of constituting. Earl of Dalhousie's Trustees v. Earl of Dalhousie, June 27, 1876, p. 882.

Disentail — Reduction of Disentail — Entail Acts 11 and 12 Vict. c. 36, sec. 1, and 16 and 17 Vict. c. 94, sec. 24.

3. An heir of entail in possession of lands held by trustees under an entail dated after 1st August 1848, and born before the date of the tailzie, presented a petition for authority to acquire in fee-simple the entailed lands, and, with the consent of his uncle and two cousins as the three next heirs, obtained from the Lord Ordinary a decree authorising the petitioner to acquire the lands in fee-simple, and ordaining the trustees to convey them to him in fee-simple. After completing his title to the lands in fee-simple the proprietor borrowed money over the estate, and granted a bond and disposition in security to a creditor.

In an action of reduction brought by his son, born after these proceedings, held (1) that the petition to acquire in fee-simple was presented without the consents required by law, in respect that the proprietor being heir under a new entail, and born before the date of the entail, could only disentail with consent of an heir-apparent who had attained the age of twenty-five, and therefore that the decree granting warrant to acquire in fee-simple, and the conveyance of the trustees following thereon, fell to be reduced; but (2) that the bond and disposition in security was protected by 16 and 17 Vict. c. 94, sec. 24. Viscount Fincastle v. Earl of Dunmore, Jan. 14, 1876, p. 345.

Equivalents to consent to Disentail—Statutes 11 and 12 Vict. c. 36 sec. 3; 16 and 17 Vict. c. 94, sec 19; 38 and 39 Vict. c. 61, sec. 5.

4. An heir of entail in possession presented a petition for disentail. He obtained the consent of the two nearest heirs, but not of the third nearest. A remit was made by the Lord Ordinary to ascertain the value of the expectancy of the third heir, but before the report had been presented an heir nearer than any of the three was born. Held that as the equivalents to consent had not been completed, the birth of a nearer heir put an end to the application. Shand, March 4, 1876, p. 544.

Disentail—Election.

5. An heir in possession of an entailed estate succeeded to another estate under an entail which required him to denude of one of them. Held that before making his election he could not make up a title to, or disentail, the second estate. Home v. Home, March 15, 1876, p. 591.

Statute 11 and 12 Vict. cap 36 (Entail Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1848), sec. 3—Date of Entail—Mortis causa deed.

6. In a question between the seller and purchaser of lands which had been disentailed, held that an entail created by a mortis causa deed dated prior to 1st August 1848, which did not come into operation until the death of the granter after that date, was to be regarded as an entail dated prior to 1st August 1848. Riddell v. Lord Polwarth, June 24, 1876, p. 879.

Disentail—Fee and Liferent—Fiduciary Fee—Entail Amendment Act, 1848 (11 and 12 Vict. c. 36), sec. 3.

7. In a marriage-contract the lady's father entailed an estate by procuratory of resignation in favour of himself in liferent, and after his death the spouses and the longest liver of them, also in liferent, but under certain restrictions and limitations, and the heir-male, whom failing, the heir-female of the marriage in fee. There being no heir-male of the marriage, after the death of her father and husband the lady and her eldest daughter jointly presented a petition for authority to disentail under the 3d section of the Entail Amendment Act. Held (1) that it was necessary to determine which of the petitioners, if either, was heir in possession within the meaning of the Act; (2) on a construction of the deed, that the interest of the spouses was restricted to a liferent allenarly; (3) that the spouses had a fiduciary fee till the dissolution of the marriage by the husband's death, when the heir of the marriage was ascertained; (4) that on the dissolution of the marriage, the eldest daughter, being ascertained to be the heir of the marriage, became heir of entail in possession; and authority granted to her to disentail upon producing the necessary consents. Maule, June 14, 1876, p. 831.

ENTAIL—Continued.

ERROR. See Issue—Sale.

EXECUTOR. Expenses.

1. Circumstances in which an executor defending an action was found personally liable in expenses, reserving his relief against the free executry estate, if any. Law v. Humphrey, July 20, 1876, p. 1192.

Bona Fides.

2. Observations on the defence of bona fide payment to beneficiaries, as stated by an executor against creditors, who have not given notice of their claims within six months. Beith v. Mackenzie, Nov. 30, 1875, p. 185.

EXPENSES. A. S. Dec. 19, 1835.

1. A Lord Ordinary ordered a minute to be lodged with regard to a branch of a case, and to a certain extent based his judgment upon matters contained in it. The Court adhered, but not upon the same grounds. The Auditor disallowed the expenses of the minute to the successful party. Held that he was entitled to his full expenses. Smith, Laing, & Co. v. Maitland &c., Jan. 7, 1876, p. 281.

Fees to Counsel.

2. Circumstances in which held that the Auditor might allow fees to counsel to be charged as between party and party though they had not been sent to counsel until after the judgment had been given. Batchelor v. Pattison, and Mackersey's Executor, July 15, 1876, p. 1086.

Withdrawal of Appeal.

3. In a case where an appeal was not timeously withdrawn, £5, 5s. of expenses allowed to the respondent. Johnston v. Rae, &c., June 24, 1876, p. 879.

Public Trust—Personal Liability for Expenses.

4. Question of personal liability of statutory trustees for expenses of an action unsuccessfully defended by them in the event of the funds of the trust being unsufficient reserved. Young, &c. v. Nith Commissioners, July 6, 1876, p. 991.

Appeal—Sheriff.

5. In an appeal from a Sheriff Court, remit made to the Sheriff to proceed with the case, with power to decide the question of expenses in the Court of Session when the case should be decided on its merits. Robertson v. Cockburn, Oct. 22, 1875, p. 21.

Company—Liquidator.

6. Expense of answers to petition for winding up disallowed, the only objection being to the person proposed as liquidator. Hume v. Directors of Highland Peat Fuel Company, June 27, 1876, p. 881.

See Church, 3—Husband and Wife, 4, 5, 6—Executor, 1—Justiciary Cases, p. 1240.

FEE AND LIFERENT.

A testator conveyed heritage to his son in liferent, for his liferent use allenarly, and to his heirs whomsoever in fee. The son survived his father, and, after executing a disposition of the subjects to testamentary trustees, died without issue. In an action of declarator by his heir of line, held that the son's right was one of liferent only, and that the pursuer had right to the subject. Cumstie v. Cumstie's Trustees, June 30, 1876, p. 921.

See Entail, 7—Succession, 5, 8.

FISHINGS. Salmon-Fishings—Crown grant.

A grant of salmon-fishings having been followed by possession so far as the fishings were available for the time, and the Crown having had no adverse possession, held that the Crown could not, cum effectu, make a grant to a different party of part of the fishings within the bounds of the original grant, although that part had not hitherto been fished, and had only now become available for being so. Baroness Gray v. Richardson and Others, July 14, 1876, p. 1031.

See Trust, 4—Justiciary Cases, p. 1240.

FOREIGN. Domicile—Succession—Testament.

1. In the construction of a testamentary deed the presumption that the testator intended his deed to be interpreted in accordance with the law of his domicile may be overcome by evidence of a contrary intention derived from the deed and the circumstances.

A woman of Scotch origin, wife of a domiciled Englishman, conveyed to trustees (a majority residing in Scotland to be a quorum) a fund, which she was entitled to dispose of under the settlement of a Scotch testator, secured over heritage in Scotland. She directed her trustees to realise the security after her husband's death, and divide the proceeds among her children. The trust-deed was prepared in Scotch form by a Scotch conveyancer, and executed in Scotland. Held that the deed must be interpreted according to the law of Scotland, that being evidently the intention of the testatrix. Mitchell and Baxter v. Davies, Dec. 3, 1875, p. 208.

Curator Bonis—Foreign Lunatic—Recall of Appointment.

2. A curator bonis was appointed to a lunatic domiciled in England in order to grant discharges of her aliment to a judicial factor on a Scotch estate. Thereafter the brother of the lunatic obtained a commission of lunacy in the Court of Chancery in England, under which committees of the person and estate were appointed to the lunatic. Upon the application of the committees of the person and estate the Court recognised their title, and recalled the curator's appointment. Sawyer, &c. v. Sloan, Dec. 17, 1875, p. 271.

Contract—Locus Solutionis.

3. A Scotch firm of shipbuilders entered into a contract, executed in Paris, to build certain steam packets for a French firm. At the same time and place a member of the Scotch firm gave a letter to a member of the French firm engaging to pay him a certain percentage on the contract price. Held that the letter constituted a Scotch contract. Valery v. Scott, July 4, 1876, p. 965.

See Bankruptcy, 3.

FRANCHISE. See Ballot Act, and Index of Registration Appeal Court Cases, p. 1239.

FRAUD. Agent and Client.

1. B. authorised his law-agents, S. and S., to make certain loans, and, inter alia, one of £1000 to T., and placed the requisite funds in the hands of S. and S. T. agreed to grant heritable security for the £1000 (which was not, however, done), and he paid interest for two years, for which receipts were granted by S. and S. as agents for B. Thereafter S. and S., to conceal their embezzlement of upwards of £1000 in their hands belonging to A., another client, by a fraudulent representation that A. was now creditor in the loan of £1000, induced T. to execute a bond and disposition in security for that amount in favour of A., which was duly recorded. In an action of reduction of the bond at the instance of T., held that although A. was no party to the fraud he was not entitled to take benefit by the fraud of S. and S., and the bond accordingly reduced. Traill v. Smith's Trustees, &c. June 3, 1876, p. 770.

Joint Stock Company.

2. Circumstances in which, held (aff. judgment of the First Division) that a joint stock company which had purchased a concession of a guano island had failed to instruct fraud on the part of the sellers (who had no beneficial interest in the sale) to the effect of entitling the company to set aside the contract and claim the purchase-money. Phosphate Sewage Company v. Molleson, June 20, 1876, H. L., p. 77.

FRAUD—Continued.

GABLE. See Property, 1, 2.

GAME. See Lease, 7, and Justiciary Cases, Trespass, p. 1243.

HARBOUR. Usage—Notice—Bye-laws.

1. A practice had existed for four years at a harbour by which steamships coming to load coals had a preference over sailing vessels in getting the use of the cranes. The owners of the harbour altered this practice (which was not fixed by the bye-laws of the harbour) without notice, putting all vessels on an equality according to their arrival. In an action of damages by the owner of a steamship for detention, held that the owners of the harbour were entitled, as a matter of management, to alter the practice, and that without notice. Moon v. Caledonian Railway Co. June 9, 1876, p. 806.

Right to Beach Boats.

2. Terms of a Harbour Act, authorising the proprietor to levy dues, held by implication to impose upon the proprietor a corresponding obligation to provide accommodation for the fishermen laying up their boats. Aiton v. Stephen, &c. Feb. 28, 1876, H. L., p. 4.

See Reparation, 3.

HARBOURS, PIERS, AND DOCKS CLAUSES ACT (10 Vict. c. 27), secs. 81 and 82. See Justiciary Index, p. 1240.

HERITABLE AND MOVEABLE. Lease—Heir and Executor.

Held that when the tenant of minerals under a lease of ordinary duration erects upon the land fixed machinery for the purpose of working the minerals, such fixtures become partes soli, and pass with the subjects to the possession of the tenant's heir succeeding to the lease, in whom also the power of severance is vested during his tenancy. Brand's Trustees v. Brand's Trustees, March 16, 1876, H. L., p. 16.

HUSBAND AND WIFE. Declarator of Nullity of Marriage—Impotence of Wife.

1. Circumstances in which the Court pronounced decree of nullity of marriage on the ground of impotence on the part of the woman, who was fifty-four years of age at the date of the marriage. C v. M, May 24, 1876, p. 693.

Impediment to Marriages, removal of—Cohabitation and Habit and Repute.

2. In a question of legitimacy held that the presumption of marriage arising from cohabitation with habit and repute was not rebutted by proof that the cohabitation had followed upon a marriage in facie ecclesiæ, which was invalid by reason of a temporary legal impediment to marriage. De Thoren v. Wall, March 16, 1876, H. L., p. 28.

Diligence—Future Debt—Inhibition—Arrestment.

3. Where a wife had used inhibition and arrestment on the dependence of an action of separation and aliment, and had afterwards used arrestments in execution of a decree of separation and aliment, held that after payment by the husband of all debts secured by the diligence, except sums to become due for future aliment, he was entitled to have the arrestments and inhibition recalled. Symington v. Symington, Dec. 3, 1875, p. 205.

Expenses.

4. In the above case held that the wife was entitled to her expenses incurred in opposing the petition for recall (taxed as between party and party). Symington v. Symington, Dec. 3, 1875, p. 205.

Divorce—Expenses.

5. It is a question for the discretion of the Court whether a wife who has unsuccessfully defended an action of divorce should be allowed her expenses in the Inner-House, and if she has reclaimed without probable grounds of success they will be refused. Kirk v. Kirk, Nov. 12, 1875, p. 128.

Divorce—Expenses—Co-defenders.

6. The expenses of a husband who was successful in an action of divorce against his wife were allowed against three co-defenders, who had lodged defences but made no further appearance, conjunctly and severally, till the order for

FISHINGS. Salmon-Fishings—Crown gr
A grant of salmon-fishings having ' against each. Kirk v. fishings were available for the ti· possession, held that the Crow a different party of part of t' as to the fi· grant, although that part h· year · become available for being or
July 14, 1876, p. 1031.
See Trust, 4—Justiciary C l·

FOREIGN. Domicile—Suc·
1. In the construction o' intended his deed domicile may be c ·, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. c. 11c.
the deed and th·
A woman of een committed to an industrial school trustees (a mr , the Lord Advocate raised an action against was entitled s of his maintenance. Held that it was not a over herit· nspector to plead that the proceedings before the after her ular, and that the warrant had been illegally granted.
The tru . Brown, Dec. 2, 1875, p. 188.
execut to th Arrestment, 3.
Mi Ship—Concealment—Change of Ship's Nationality—Merchant
Cur· ping Act, 1873—Board of Trade Inspection.
2. A vessel was transferred by means of a fictitious sale from the British to the Belgian flag, for the purpose of avoiding the inspection provided by the "Merchant Shipping Act, 1873." The vessel was subsequently insured. In an action upon the policy, the vessel having been lost, held that failure to mention the change of nationality to the underwriters, some of whom had a year before insured the vessel as a British ship, was a concealment of a material fact which would have influenced a prudent underwriter in determining whether to accept or decline the risk, and therefore voided the policy, although the defenders did not maintain that the vessel was unseaworthy when she sailed upon the voyage for which she was insured. Hutchinson and Co. v. Aberdeen Sea Insurance Co., May 23, 1876, p. 682.
Marine Insurance—Foreign Average Statement—Contributory Value.
2. A policy of insurance effected on cargo, consisting of two lots of iron, valued therein respectively at £610 and £215, and on £25 cash advanced to account of freight, contained the following clause:—"General average payable according to foreign statement, if so made up." On the voyage the ship was damaged, and the master granted a bond of bottomry and respondentia over ship and cargo for repairs and other expenses. At the port of destination a general average statement was made up, in which £1293 was fixed as the contributory value of the cargo. The ship and freight being unable to pay their share of the bond, the balance fell to be paid, under German law, by the owners of cargo "on the principles of general average," and a second statement was made up embodying the first. Held that the policy-holders were entitled to recover the whole amount paid by them (being under £850) from the underwriters, and not only the amount effeiring to £850 out of £1293, in respect that the liability of the cargo, as shewn in the final statement, was for the general balance due under the bond after applying the proceeds of the sale of the ship and the freight. Robinows and Marjoribanks v. Ewing's Trustees, July 20, 1876, p. 1134.
Warranty—False statement—Assignation—Assignatus utitur jure auctoris.
3. A policy of life assurance contained a stipulation that in case it should afterwards appear "that any untrue averment was contained in the declaration by the assured as to his age or state of health, the policy should be void." Held that false statements by the assured in the declaration were a relevant ground of reduction of the policy in the hands of an onerous assignee. Scottish Widows' Fund v. Buist, &c., July 14, 1876, p. 1078.

Breach of Interdi -Landlord and Tenant.

of a patent for the accommodation of the miners in his he Court ov stream formerly suitable for primary uses.
respond surface water and water from washing-d inte the stream, other arrangements being moval of excreta and refuse from the by the inhabitants, would have pre-hing the stream. In an action for instance of an inferior heritor who olluted the stream the defender l channel of the drainage of his tion. Held, on consideration drains had been proved, and suer would be entitled to e defender. Caledonian 39.

Trial

having ntly presented or breach of interdict.
Lord Ordinary without a
, July 5, 1876, p. 974.

d that a person could not claim damages for from proceeding with a building which it was no right to erect, although the interdict was recalled per remedy in the circumstances. Jack v. Begg, Oct.

See Road, 1.

of his moveable rote upon one amounted to xcept a son
The paper editors in her, by r the his nn

ISSUE. Reduction—Error.

A father and mother aged respectively seventy-eight and brought an action against a daughter and her husband vocable disposition granted by the pursuers six months subject to the pursuers' liferents, and certain burdens, the able estate, and a liferent of heritage, were conferred upon the consideration of her, in time coming, assisting the mother in the ment of a hotel. The pursuers averred that the deed was executed essential error on their part, they believing that the deed was a testamentary deed making alterations upon a prior settlement in accordance with instructions given by them to their law-agent, while, in fact, it was irrevocable and not in accordance with these instructions; and further, that the error had been induced by the defenders in instructing the law-agent, and by the law-agent, or by one or other of them; and further, that the error had been fraudulently induced by these parties. Held that besides an issue of fraud the pursuers were entitled to the issue "whether the pursuers in granting the disposition were under essential error as to the substance and effect of the said deed," without the addition of the words "induced by the defenders," as contended for by the defenders. M'Laurin
v. Stafford, Dec. 17, 1875, p. 265.

JOINT ADVENTURE. See Partnership, 2.

JOINT STOCK COMPANY. See Fraud, 2—Partnership.

JUDICIAL FACTOR, CURATOR BONIS, &c. Investment on Security of Rates.

1. Investments by a curator bonis secured respectively (1) on rates leviable under the Aberdeen County and Municipal Buildings Act, 1866, and the Sheriff Court Houses Act, 1860, or (2) on rates leviable under the Aberdeenshire Road Act, 1865, approved of. Grainger's Curator, Feb. 23, 1876, p. 479.

Special Powers—Insanity—Aliment—Nobile Officium.

2. An application by the curator bonis of a person incapax, for authority to pay out of the surplus income of the ward's estate an alimentary allowance to the only brother and heir-at-law of the ward, who was in destitute circumstances, refused, on the ground that this was a matter in which the Court would not interfere with the discretion of the curator. Dunbar, March 7, 1876, p. 554.

Powers—Sanctum of the Court to a purchase of heritage by a curator bonis.

3. Circumstances in which the Court approved of a purchase of heritage by the proof, and thereafter in the proportion of one-third against each. Kirk v. Kirk, Nov. 12, 1875, p. 128.

HUSBAND AND WIFE—Continued.

Consistorial Cause.

7. Opinions that the instructions to Commissaries of 1563 as to the finality of decrees in the Commissary Courts after the expiry of a year and day did not obtain with respect to decrees of the Court of Session in causes the jurisdiction in which had been transferred from the Commissaries to the Court of Session. Lockyer v. Ferryman, &c., June 28, 1876, p. 882.

See Res Judicata.

INCOME TAX. See Revenue.

INDICTMENT. See Index of Justiciary Cases, p. 1240.

INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS ACT. Industrial Schools Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. c. 118), secs. 14, 35, 38.

A boy, chargeable to a parish, having been committed to an industrial school under a warrant ex facie regular, the Lord Advocate raised an action against the inspector for the expenses of his maintenance. Held that it was not a relevant defence for the inspector to plead that the proceedings before the magistrate were irregular, and that the warrant had been illegally granted. Lord Advocate v. Brown, Dec. 2, 1875, p. 188.

INHIBITION. See Arrestment, 3.

INSURANCE. Ship—Concealment—Change of Ship's Nationality—Merchant Shipping Act, 1873—Board of Trade Inspection.

1. A vessel was transferred by means of a fictitious sale from the British to the Belgian flag, for the purpose of avoiding the inspection provided by the "Merchant Shipping Act, 1873." The vessel was subsequently insured. In an action upon the policy, the vessel having been lost, held that failure to mention the change of nationality to the underwriters, some of whom had a year before insured the vessel as a British ship, was a concealment of a material fact which would have influenced a prudent underwriter in determining whether to accept or decline the risk, and therefore voided the policy, although the defenders did not maintain that the vessel was unseaworthy when she sailed upon the voyage for which she was insured. Hutchinson and Co. v. Aberdeen Sea Insurance Co., May 23, 1876, p. 682.

Marine Insurance—Foreign Average Statement—Contributory Value.

2. A policy of insurance effected on cargo, consisting of two lots of iron, valued therein respectively at £610 and £215, and on £25 cash advanced to account of freight, contained the following clause:—"General average payable according to foreign statement, if so made up." On the voyage the ship was damaged, and the master granted a bond of bottomry and respondentia over ship and cargo for repairs and other expenses. At the port of destination a general average statement was made up, in which £1293 was fixed as the contributory value of the cargo. The ship and freight being unable to pay their share of the bond, the balance fell to be paid, under German law, by the owners of cargo "on the principles of general average," and a second statement was made up embodying the first. Held that the policy-holders were entitled to recover the whole amount paid by them (being under £850) from the underwriters, and not only the amount effeiring to £850 out of £1293, in respect that the liability of the cargo, as shewn in the final statement, was for the general balance due under the bond after applying the proceeds of the sale of the ship and the freight. Robinows and Marjoribanks v. Ewing's Trustees, July 20, 1876, p. 1134.

Warranty—False statement—Assignation—Assignatus utitur jure auctoris.

3. A policy of life assurance contained a stipulation that in case it should afterwards appear "that any untrue averment was contained in the declaration by the assured as to his age or state of health, the policy should be void." Held that false statements by the assured in the declaration were a relevant ground of reduction of the policy in the hands of an onerous assignee. Scottish Widows' Fund v. Buist, &c., July 14, 1876, p. 1078.

INTERDICT. Breach of Interdict—Patent.

1. The holder of a patent obtained interdict against a person to prevent infringement, the Court overruling an objection to the validity of the patent. Thereupon the respondent immediately assumed a partner. Another note of suspension and interdict was presented by the holder of the patent against the new firm. Held that the complainer's proper remedy was a complaint for breach of interdict against the respondent in the former process, and not a new note of suspension and interdict. Dudgeon v. Thomson and Donaldson, March 17, 1876, p. 604.

Breach of Interdict—Jury Trial or Proof.

2. The holder of a patent having obtained an interdict against B infringing the same subsequently presented a petition and complaint against B, and C, his partner, for breach of interdict. Held that the case should be tried before the Lord Ordinary without a jury. Dudgeon v. Thomson and Donaldson, July 5, 1876, p. 974.

Damages.

3. Held that a person could not claim damages for being prevented by interdict from proceeding with a building which it was ultimately found that he had no right to erect, although the interdict was recalled as not being the proper remedy in the circumstances. Jack v. Begg, Oct. 26, 1875, p. 35.

See Road, 1.

ISSUE. Reduction—Error.

A father and mother aged respectively seventy-eight and seventy-five years brought an action against a daughter and her husband to reduce an irrevocable disposition granted by the pursuers six months before, whereby, subject to the pursuers' liferents, and certain burdens, the parents' moveable estate, and a liferent of heritage, were conferred upon the daughter in consideration of her, in time coming, assisting the mother in the management of a hotel. The pursuers averred that the deed was executed under essential error on their part, they believing that the deed was a revocable testamentary deed making alterations upon a prior settlement in accordance with instructions given by them to their law-agent, while, in fact, it was irrevocable and not in accordance with these instructions; and further, that the error had been induced by the defenders in instructing the law-agent, and by the law-agent, or by one or other of them; and further, that the error had been fraudulently induced by these parties. Held that besides an issue of fraud the pursuers were entitled to the issue "whether the pursuers in granting the disposition were under essential error as to the substance and effect of the said deed," without the addition of the words "induced by the defenders," as contended for by the defenders. M'Laurin v. Stafford, Dec. 17, 1875, p. 265.

JOINT ADVENTURE. See Partnership, 2.

JOINT STOCK COMPANY. See Fraud, 2—Partnership.

JUDICIAL FACTOR, CURATOR BONIS, &c. Investment on Security of Rates.

1. Investments by a curator bonis secured respectively (1) on rates leviable under the Aberdeen County and Municipal Buildings Act, 1866, and the Sheriff Court Houses Act, 1860, or (2) on rates leviable under the Aberdeenshire Road Act, 1865, approved of. Grainger's Curator, Feb. 23, 1876, p. 479.

Special Powers—Insanity—Aliment—Nobile Officium.

2. An application by the curator bonis of a person incapax, for authority to pay out of the surplus income of the ward's estate an alimentary allowance to the only brother and heir-at-law of the ward, who was in destitute circumstances, refused, on the ground that this was a matter in which the Court would not interfere with the discretion of the curator. Dunbar, March 7, 1876, p. 554.

Powers—Sanction of the Court to a purchase of heritage by a curator bonis.

3. Circumstances in which the Court approved of a purchase of heritage by the curator bonis of a lunatic made without a previous application to the Court. Gilray, March 18, 1876, p. 619.

JUDICIAL FACTOR, CURATOR BONIS, &c.—Continued.

Foreign Lunatic—Recall of Appointment.

4. A curator bonis was appointed to a lunatic domiciled in England in order to grant discharges of her aliment to a judicial factor on a Scotch estate. Thereafter the brother of the lunatic obtained a commission of lunacy in the Court of Chancery in England, under which committees of the person and estate were appointed to the lunatic. Upon the application of the committees of the person and estate the Court recognised their title and recalled the curator's appointment. Sawyer, &c. v. Sloan, Dec. 17, 1875, p. 271.

See Pupil.

JUDICIAL INSPECTION. See Carrier.

JURISDICTION. See Church, 1—Lease, 1—Police, 2, 3—Sheriff, 1, 3, 4.

LANDLORD AND TENANT. See Lease.

LEASE. Jurisdiction—Sheriff.

1. An action to compel a person to implement a lease, by entering into possession and paying the rent, may competently proceed in the Sheriff Court, although the Sheriff may have to decide upon the constitution of the lease, in consequence of the defender's denial of its existence. Robertson v. Cockburn, Oct. 22, 1875, p. 21.

Proof of Lease—Writ or Oath.

2. The proprietor of a house and garden in a town obtained a Sheriff Court decree ordaining the tenant to remove at the Whitsunday removing term 1875, being the expiry of seven months for which he alleged the premises had been let.

In a suspension brought by the tenant he alleged—1. a verbal agreement for a lease of five years followed by possession and rei interventus; and 2. an interim agreement for a yearly tenancy. Held that the suspender could only prove the averment as to a five years' lease by writ or oath, but that the averment as to a yearly tenancy could be proved prout de jure, and the landlord, in respect of his averments as to a seven months' tenancy, appointed to lead in the proof. Gibson v. Adams, &c., Nov. 20, 1875, p. 144.

Proof of Lease—Singular Successor.

3. Writings held sufficient to prove a lease for a term of years in a question with a singular successor of the granter. Wilson v. Mann, March 2, 1876, p. 527.

Accessory—Road.

4. Circumstances in which it was held that the tenant of a farm had failed to shew that he had a right, either by express contract or by implied grant, to use a private road passing through other grounds belonging to the landlord. Duncan v. Scott, June 20, 1876, H. L., p. 69.

Dwelling-House—Hypothec—Obligation to Furnish—Sheriff.

5. A summary petition to the Sheriff by the landlord of a house in a town to have the tenant ordained to plenish the house with sufficient furniture to secure the current year's rent, or to find caution for the same, and, failing the tenant obtempering the order, for a warrant to eject the tenant, and let the house, is competent. Wright v. Wightman, Oct. 30, 1875, p. 68.

Reparation—Game—Rabbits—Game Tenant—Relief.

6. The game tenant of a farm held bound to relieve the landlord of damages found due by him to the agricultural tenant for injury to his crops by rabbits, without any clause in the game lease to that effect. Kidd v. Byrne. Byrne v. Johnson, Dec. 16, 1875, p. 255.

Reparation—Damages—Game—Rabbits.

7. The lease of a farm reserved to the landlord the whole game and rabbits, and bound the tenant to preserve the game of all kinds, including rabbits, "to the utmost of his power." It also contained a stipulation that "the tenant shall have no claim whatever for any damage he may sustain from game, hares, and rabbits, during the lease, this being held to have been calculated upon and allowed for by him in offering for the farm." In an action of damages by the tenant for injury alleged to have been done to his crops by an excessive increase of rabbits, held (1) that the tenant's claim was not excluded by the clause in the lease above quoted; but (2) that, having regard to the terms of the lease, the tenant had not proved such an increase of rabbits as to entitle him to damages. Cadzow v. Lockhart, May 19, 1876, p. 666.

LEASE—Continued.

Minerals—Refusal to remove—Violent Profits—Reparation—Damages.

8. It was agreed between the landlord and tenant of a colliery that in the event of the tenant's death during the currency of the lease the landlord should be entitled to resume possession of the colliery, "if he should at any time be dissatisfied with the working thereof by the representatives" of the tenant. The tenant having died, the landlord, twelve months thereafter, intimated by letter to his representatives that he was dissatisfied with their working of the colliery, and had resolved to resume possession thereof in terms of the agreement. The tenant's representatives refused to cede possession, and unsuccessfully defended an action raised against them by the landlord to enforce removal. Held (1) that the landlord's remedy against the defenders was not a claim for violent profits but for damages for breach of contract in not removing in terms of the agreement, and (2) that in the circumstances he was entitled to damages. Houldsworth v. Brand's Trustees, Jan. 8, 1876, p. 304.

Meliorations—Compensation.

9. An agricultural tenant died during the fifth year of a nineteen years' lease. The curator bonis of his heir, who was a lunatic, declined to take up the lease, and the landlord refused to accept the executors as tenants. The landlord obtained decree in the Sheriff Court against the executors for the expense of repairing fences and buildings which the tenant was bound to keep up. The executors in a suspension stated as a set off pro tanto against the landlord's claim the value of unexhausted manures and improvements by which the landlord had been lucratus in consequence of the premature termination of the lease, for which they also raised an action. Held that the tenant's meliorations could not found a claim against the landlord, and therefore could not be pleaded in compensation. Scott's Executors v. Hepburn, June 14, 1876, p. 816.

Mutual Obligation—Compensation—Retention—Liquid and Illiquid—Rescission of Contract.

10. Circumstances in which a tenant was entitled, without raising a separate action, to set off against the landlord's claim for rent a claim of damages for a persistent violation of the lease on the part of the landlord, and opinions expressed that the tenant was entitled to rescind the lease. Davie v. Stark, July 18, 1876, p. 1114.

See Heritable and Moveable—Nuisance—Railway, 1.

MANDATE. Writ—Erasure.

Held (1) that mandates, bearing to be granted for a meeting of a parochial board to be held on 2d August, "or any subsequent date to which such meeting may be adjourned, for the election of an inspector of poor in room of," &c., were validly tendered, and ought to have been admitted at a meeting of the board held for that purpose on September 5th, although no meeting had been held on the 2d August; (2) that mandates bearing to be for a meeting to be held on August 16th were valid, although the figure "6" was printed on an erasure, from which the figure "5" had been removed. Muir v. Thompson, Feb. 28, 1876, H. L., p. 1.

MARRIAGE. See Husband and Wife—Church, 5.

MARRIAGE-CONTRACT. See Succession, 5.

MASTER AND SERVANT. Reparation.

1. When a master orders a labourer to do a piece of work, out of the line of his ordinary employment, which could with safety be done only by a skilled workman, the master is responsible should any accident happen to the workman. Robertson v. Brown, May 17, 1876, p. 652.

Reparation—Culpa—Collaborateur.

2. Held that where a coalmaster had devolved the entire charge of a coal-pit upon a competent manager and competent subordinates he could not be made liable in damages for the death of a miner employed in the pit, alleged to have been caused by their fault. Sneddon v. Mossend Iron Co., June 23, 1876, p. 868.

Master's responsibility for Servant's delict—Relevancy.

3. A pursuer averred that the defenders W. and T., being in the service of the other defender H., and acting with his authority, or at least for his behoof, did on a turnpike road shoot at and kill the pursuer's dog, and wound the pursuer. Held that there was no relevant averment inferring liability against H., and action against him dismissed. Wardrope v. Duke of Hamilton, June 24, 1876, p. 876.

See Reparation, 1.

MEMBER OF PARLIAMENT. See Index of Registration Appeal Cases, p. 1239.

MINERALS. Superior and Vassal—Servitude.

1. B acquired in feu from A three contiguous parcels of lands. In the titles to the different parcels A reserved respectively:—

(1) "The coals and coal heughs to be won and disposed upon at our pleasure."

(2) "The whole coal, stone quarries, and all other metals and minerals, with power to search for, work, and carry away the same."

(3) "The coal, with full power to dig for, work, win, and carry away the same."

A was proprietor of the land surrounding B's, and leased the whole coal-field thereunder, including the coals under B's lands, to a coal company who drove a mine, with its entrance in A's lands, cross-cutting coal and other strata in B's lands, to A's lands beyond, and thereby conveyed the minerals wrought under these last-mentioned lands to the surface.

Held that A and his lessees were not entitled to use the mine under B's lands for conveying minerals wrought under A's lands, except in so far as the mine passed through coal wastes under B's lands, or other reserved minerals. Blair v. Ramsay, &c., May 22, 1876, H. L., p. 41, aff. judgment of Court of Session Oct. 22, 1875, Court of Session Cases, p. 25.

Water—Mining Operations.

2. In an action brought by the tenants of a coal mine against the tenant of an adjoining mine belonging to the same proprietor for damage caused by water flowing into the pursuers' mine from the defender's workings, it was proved that the water consisted—(1) of the natural drainage of the defender's mine; and (2) of water collected on and diverted from the surface in consequence of the dislocation of drains and the subsidence of portions of the surface through the defender's mining operations. It was also proved that the pursuers had, with the landlord's permission, worked into and removed a natural barrier of coal between the mines, which would have prevented the flow of water complained of. Held that the pursuers had been in fault in destroying the barrier between the mines, and therefore that they were not entitled to recover damages from the defender. Wilsons v. Waddell, Jan. 8, 1876, p. 288.

See Lease, 8—Superior and Vassal, 4.

MINOR. See Pupil.

NEGLIGENCE. See Reparation, 1, 2, 3, 4.

NOBILE OFFICIUM. See Judicial Factor—Pupil.

NUISANCE. Pollution—Stream—Landlord and Tenant.

A proprietor erected a village for the accommodation of the miners in his employment on the banks of a stream formerly suitable for primary uses. Drains were provided to carry off surface water and water from washing-houses through filtering beds into the stream, other arrangements being made by the proprietor for the removal of excreta and refuse from the miners' cottages, which, if attended to by the inhabitants, would have prevented such polluting matters from reaching the stream. In an action for interdict against the proprietor at the instance of an inferior heritor who alleged that the water from the drains polluted the stream the defender pleaded (1) that the stream was the natural channel of the drainage of his lands, and (2) that there had been no pollution. Held, on consideration of a proof, that pollution of the stream by the drains had been proved, and that, unless the pollution was stopped, the pursuer would be entitled to have his rights protected by interdict against the defender. Caledonian Railway Co. v. Baird and Co., June 14, 1876, p. 839.

See Reparation, 2.

OATH, REFERENCE TO. See Proof, 3, 4.

PARENT AND CHILD. Legitim—Donation.

1. A advanced the sum of £1000, being nearly the whole of his moveable estate, to one of his sons, who, at his father's request, wrote upon one sheet of paper three I O U's (the sums in which together amounted to £1000), one being in favour of each of A's other children, except a son whom he desired to exclude from all share in his succession. The paper containing the I O U's was then handed in turn to two of the creditors in the obligations (the third was deaf and dumb) and finally to the father, by whom it was retained till his death, which occurred nine months after the transaction. Held, in a claim for legitim by the excluded son against his father's trustees, that the whole circumstances, and, particularly, the retention of the obligatory documents by the father, shewed that the transaction was simulate, and that the fund formed part of the personal estate of the father at the time of his death. Buchanan v. Buchanan, March 7, 1876, p. 556.

Proof—Filiation.

2. Circumstances in which held that the paternity of an illegitimate child had been proved. Dunn v. Chalmers, Dec. 10, 1875, p. 236.

Illegitimate Child—Proof—Presumption.

3. The defender in an action of filiation admitted intercourse with the pursuer 311 days before the birth of the child, and the pursuer did not allege any subsequent intercourse. Held, notwithstanding some evidence which tended to shew that the period of gestation was exceptionally long, that the pursuer had failed to overcome the presumption against so long a period of gestation, and the defender assoilzied. Henderson v. Somers, July 7, 1876, p. 997.

Legitimacy—Proof of Paternity.

4. A man who marries a woman whom he knows to be pregnant, raises a presumption of fact that he is the father of her child, which it is not easy to rebut.

Held, upon this and other grounds, that a man had failed to prove that he was not the father of a child to which his wife gave birth six weeks after the date of the marriage. Gardner v. Gardner, May 30, 1876, p. 695.

PARISH. See Church—School.

PARTNERSHIP. Private Partnerships.

Existence of Partnership.

1. Two parties to a written contract of copartnery brought an action against the father of the third party, and the third party, for declarator that the father was a partner, alleging that immediately after the contract was signed they had discovered that the father was really the partner, and that he had been then accepted by them, and had acted as partner. Held that the action was not relevant. Clippens Shale Oil Co. v. Scott, May 17, 1876, p. 651.

PARTNERSHIP—Continued.

Joint Adventure.

2. Circumstances in which held that one of two parties to a joint adventure in minerals was entitled to bring the joint adventure to an end. Miller v. Walker, Dec. 10, 1875, p. 242.

See Right in Security.

Joint Stock Companies.

Companies Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845—Transfer of Shares—Bankruptcy.

3. A shareholder in a railway company executed a transfer, and after a year became bankrupt, the shares still standing in his name. Thereafter the transferee recorded the transfer in the company's register of transfers. Held that he was preferable to the trustee in the sequestration, who had not completed his title under the 19th section of the Companies Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845. Morrison v. Harrison, &c., Feb. 3, 1876, p. 406.

Winding up under supervision of the Court—Companies Act, 1862, secs. 147, 148, and 151.

4. Procedure in a petition, presented five days before the rising of the Court, for continuing the voluntary winding up of a company subject to the supervision of the Court. Christie, &c., March 18, 1876, p. 623.

Liquidator—Statute 25 and 26 Vict. c. 89 (Companies Act, 1862), sec. 138.

5. Held that the liquidator of a Scotch joint stock company, appointed under the Companies Acts of 1862 and 1867, who had gone to reside in England in the course of the liquidation, was entitled to obtain decree under secs. 121 and 138 of the Companies Act, 1862, against contributories who had failed to make payment of calls. Robertson, Oct. 20, 1875, p. 17.

Voluntary Winding up—Extraordinary Resolution—Companies Act, 1862, secs. 51 and 129.

6. A company, by circular, gave notice to its shareholders that an extraordinary meeting would be held "to consider, and, if approved of, to sanction the voluntary winding up of the company." The notice also contained this statement—"The directors enclose a balance-sheet of the company's affairs, prepared by the auditor to this date. From the result of that balance it will be apparent that it is hopeless to carry on the company with any prospect of success." The meeting passed a resolution in terms of sec. 129, sub-sec. (3) of the Companies Act, 1862, and appointed a liquidator. No meeting was called to confirm this resolution. In an application by the liquidator to have a creditor restrained from doing diligence against the company, held that the resolution was invalid, in respect that the notice did not shew that it was intended to propose an extraordinary resolution under sub-sec. (3), but merely a resolution under sub-sec. (2), which would have required confirmation at a subsequent meeting. Wilson v. M'Genn and Co., Feb. 19, 1876, p. 474.

Companies Act, 1862, secs. 129 and 51—Voluntary Winding Up—Liquidation—Notice—Special Resolution.

7. A notice was given of a meeting of a company "for the purpose of considering the present position of the company, and to consider and resolve whether, under existing circumstances, the company should be wound up, and, if so resolved upon, to decide in what manner this should be done." At the meeting a resolution was carried to wind up the company voluntarily. Held that the notice was sufficient. Sdeuard v. Gardner, March 10, 1876, p. 577.

PARTNERSHIP—Continued.

Statute 25 and 26 Vict. c. 89 (Companies Act, 1862—Voluntary Winding Up—Powers of the Court to stay proceedings at instance of Creditors against a Company in Liquidation.

8. Held that the 138th section of the Companies Act, 1862, did not give the Court power to stay proceedings by creditors against a company which was being wound up voluntarily. Sdeuard v. Gardner, March 10, 1876, p. 577.

See Agent and Principal, 1—Fraud, 2.

PATENT.

In the specification of their patent, patentees described their invention as consisting "in new or improved simple and most efficient modes of and arrangements of mechanism, for actuating the set or sets of 'compound' or 'multiple' shuttle boxes of looms," and after describing in detail the various parts of a shuttle box moving and holding mechanism, and a pattern mechanism, and mechanism for connecting the two, they claimed,—"First, the construction and arrangements of the parts of pattern mechanism and shuttle box moving and holding mechanism as herein distinguished generally for actuating the shuttle boxes of power-looms, all substantially in the new or improved manner herein described and shewn in the accompaning drawings, or any mere modification thereof." They also claimed,—Second, third, and fourth, particular portions or movements in the general mechanism described in the first claim. Held (in rev. judgment of First Division) (1) that in a claim for a mere combination it is not necessary to explain what is the novelty and what the merit of the invention, otherwise than by a description of the combination as a whole, nor to specify what of the combined parts are old and what are new; (2) that the claim to certain subordinate parts excludes the possibility of a claim to any other subordinate parts as novel, without any special disclaimer; and (3) that the first claim in the specification was ex facie a valid and sufficient claim for a mere combination, the second, third, and fourth claims in claiming certain subordinate parts as novel by implication disclaiming the rest.

Observed (per Lord Chancellor)—"If there is a patent for a combination the combination is itself ex necessitate the novelty; and the combination is also the merit, if it be a merit, which remains to be proved by evidence. So also with regard to the discrimination between what is new and what is old. If it is clear that the claim is for a combination, and nothing but a combination, there is no infringement unless the whole combination is used, and it is in that way immaterial whether any or which of the parts are new."

Observations (per cur.) on the cases of Foxwell v. Bostock, 4 De Gex, Jones, and Smith, 298, and Lister v. Leather, 8 El. and Black. 1004. Harrisons v. Anderston Foundry Co. June 20, 1876, H. L., p. 55.

See Interdict, 1, 2.

POINDING THE GROUND.

A creditor holding a recorded ex facie absolute disposition to lands belonging to his debtor is not entitled to use the diligence of poinding of the ground. Scottish Heritable Security Co. v. Allan, Campbell, and Co. Jan. 14, 1876, p. 333.

POLICE. Police and Improvement Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 101), sec. 130.

1. The 130th section of the General Police and Improvement Act, 1862, does not impose on owners of common stairs, &c. the duty of supplying gas or other illuminating substance. Stewart v. Edwards, Dec. 8, 1875, Justiciary Cases, p. 14.

Police and Improvement Acts, 1850 and 1868, 13 and 14 Vict. c. 33, 31 and 32 Vict. c. 102—Police Commissioners.

2. The Police and Improvement Act, 1850, enacts that "any householder" of the burgh shall be eligible to be elected a commissioner. The Police Act,

POLICE—Continued.

1868, defines the word "householder" to be "a male occupier of lands or premises of the yearly value of £4 and upwards as appearing on the valuation-roll." The valuation-roll of a burgh contained an entry of "David Swan junior and Company" as occupiers of premises of the annual value of £220. At 31st December a change took place in the partnership, the new firm taking the name of David Swan and Sons. At an election of police commissioners in June 1875, a person, who was a partner of the new firm, and held a written authority from the new firm to vote, was elected a commissioner. In an action brought by a defeated candidate to reduce the election, on the ground that the defender had not the qualification, as neither his name, nor the name of his firm, appeared in the valuation-roll, held (1) that the Court had jurisdiction to entertain the objection; but (2) that the objection was not valid, as the candidate had a substantial qualification. M'Donald v. Robertson, May 17, 1876, p. 645.

Jurisdiction—13 and 14 Vict. c. 33, sec. 31, Police and Improvement Act, 1850—Election—Scrutiny.

3. An objection by a candidate, claiming to have been elected at an election of police commissioners, that a number of persons had voted who had not paid their assessments, and were therefore, under section 34 of 13 and 14 Vict. c. 33, not entitled to vote, can only be inquired into by a committee of the commissioners upon a complaint brought under section 31 of 13 and 14 Vict. c. 33. M'Donald v. Robertson, May 17, 1876, p. 645.

Election of Police Commissioners—Treating.

4. Held that treating of voters by candidates at an election of police commissioners was not a relevant ground for setting aside the election. M'Donald v. Robertson, May 17, 1876, p. 645.

Appeal—Police and Improvement Act, 1850 (13 and 14 Vict. c. 33), secs. 286, 310—Nuisances Removal Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 103), sec. 64.

5. Police Commissioners served notice upon a house proprietor under the 64th section of the Nuisances Removal Act, requiring him to pave a street. The proprietor having paid no attention to the notice, the commissioners paved the street themselves, and raised an action in the Sheriff Court against the proprietor under the same section for recovery of the expense. The defender averred that the street was not of the description which under the statute he was bound to pave. The commissioners maintained that the defender not having appealed against the notice to the Sheriff under the 286th section of the Police and Improvement Act, 1850, he had acquiesced, and the matter was concluded. Held that the 286th section related solely to matters "the cost attending which was directed to be provided for by way of private or district assessment," and had no application to proceedings under the 64th section of the Nuisances Removal Act, and the relative 310th section of the Police and Improvement Act directing expenses to be recovered as a debt, and therefore that the defender was not precluded from defending the action on the merits. Dundee Police Commissioners v. Mitchell, June 2, 1876, p. 762.

Police and Improvement Act, 1862, sec. 35.

6. In 1875 the burgh of Kirriemuir adopted the General Police Act of 1862, the 35th section of which provides that, if the Act is adopted, "any general or local Police Act within such burgh shall be repealed, excepting in so far as it may relate to matters not provided for in this Act." Held that the clause did not apply to provisions in the Forfarshire Roads Act, passed in 1874, imposing the burden of maintaining existing foot pavements of streets in the burgh upon the police commissioners. Kirriemuir Police Commissioners v. Reid's Trustees, July 7, 1876, p. 993.

Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862, 25 and 26 Vict. c. 101, sec. 132.

7. The Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862, sec. 132, enacts that, in burghs adopting the Act, "the dust," "ashes," "rubbish," &c., "within the burgh shall be and hereby are vested in the police commissioners," and that they shall cause the same to be collected from the "streets, houses, and premises" in the burgh. Held that the enactment did not apply to ashes produced in the furnaces of a manufactory. Pullar and Sons v. Perth Police Commissioners, July 20, 1876, p. 1176.

POLICE—Continued.
See Reparation, 4.

POOR. Settlement—Relief—Desertion by a Husband.
1. In questions of parochial relief the rule that the desertion by a husband of his wife and children is during the period of desertion equivalent to his death applies in all such cases. The rule applied in a case where a deserting husband who had a birth settlement in Scotland had (if he was alive) during the desertion lost a residential settlement by non-residence. Greig v. Simpson and Craig, May 16, 1876, p. 642.
Sheriff—Jurisdiction—Collection of Assessment—8 and 9 Vict. c. 83, sec. 88.
2. Held that in an action brought in the Sheriff Court by a parochial board for recovery of poor-rates, the function of the Sheriff is not ministerial to interpone judicial authority for recovery of the assessment but judicial, and that it is competent for the Sheriff to entertain and decide questions as to the legality of the assessment. M'Tavish v. Commissioners of Caledonian Canal, Feb. 3, 1876, p. 412.
See Industrial Schools Act.

POORS-ROLL.
A wife and her husband, pursuers of an action of reduction of a deed on the ground of inadequate consideration, circumvention, and forgery, applied for admission to the benefit of the poors-roll. It appeared that they had one child living in family with them who earned 6s. a-week, while the husband's wages were £1 a-week. Held, in consideration of the nature of the allegations in the summons, and after a report of probabilis causa, that they were entitled to be admitted. M'Gill, &c. v. Bell's Trustees, Feb. 5, 1876, p. 427.

PRESCRIPTION. See Trust, 4.

PRESUMPTION OF LIFE. See Succession, 8.

PROCESS. Summons.
Competency—Value of the Cause—Stat. 50 Geo. III. c. 112 (Judicature Act, 1810), sec. 28.
1. The owners of a vessel sued fifty underwriters under a policy of assurance on their vessel for £60, 13s. 1d. "according to the several proportions for which the policy was underwritten by them, viz. £1, 4s. 3½d. each." Held that the action was competent in the Court of Session, as the sum which the pursuers sued for exceeded £25. Nelson, Donkin, and Co. v. Browne, &c., June 10, 1876, p. 810.
Contract—Lease.
2. A Sheriff Court summons concluding generally against a tenant for implement of a contract of lease held insufficient, but allowed to be amended by the insertion of the words "by entering into possession of the premises and paying the rent when due." Robertson v. Cockburn, Oct. 22, 1875, p. 21.
Lis alibi pendens. Defences.
3. The Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor finding that a summons was informal, dismissing the action, finding the defender entitled to expenses, and remitting his account to the Auditor for taxation. Before the account was taxed a second summons was signeted, executed, and called at the instance of the same pursuer against the same defender, with the same conclusions. Held that the plea of lis alibi pendens fell to be sustained. Kennedy v. Macdonald, June 12, 1875, p. 813.
Decree by Default.
Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 26—Decree by default—Res judicata.
4. A decree of absolvitor upon the pursuer's failure to deliver printed proofs of the record in terms of sec. 26 of the Court of Session Act, 1868, is a decree in foro, and, so long as it subsists, will exclude a new action upon the same grounds. Forrest v. Dunlop, Oct. 15, 1875, p. 15.

PROCESS—Continued.

Reponing—Decree by default.

5. The reponing of a party against whom decree by default has gone out is a matter for the discretion of the Court. Circumstances in which a defender was reponed upon payment of the previous expenses incurred by the pursuer. Anderson v. Garson, Dec. 16, 1875, p. 254.

Attendance of Counsel.

6. The Division Roll will be called in regular order, and the fact of counsel being engaged in a proof will not be taken as an excuse for not appearing in the Division. Wilson v. Mann, March 2, 1876, p. 527.

Appeal—Print.

7. An appellant found liable in £2, 2s. of expenses, in respect that the appeal was imperfectly printed. Roxburgh and Co. v. Barlas, Jan. 8, 1876, p. 288.

Review.

Reclaiming Note—Statute 48 Geo. III. c. 151, sec. 16.

8. Where the days for reclaiming against a Lord Ordinary's interlocutor had expired, without a reclaiming note being lodged, the party moved the Lord Ordinary for leave to reclaim under the Act of 1808, sec. 16. The Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor refusing the motion, against which the party reclaimed. Held, in the circumstances, that the Lord Ordinary had exercised a sound discretion in refusing leave to reclaim.

But question, whether it was competent to bring the Lord Ordinary's judgment in the matter under review. Magistrates of Leith v. Lennon, Nov. 23, 1875, p. 152.

Reclaiming Note—Law Agents Act, 1873, sec. 7.

9. Sec. 7 of the Law Agents Act provides "that a petition by a person to be admitted as a law-agent may be presented to any Judge of the Court officiating as a Lord Ordinary, and the proceedings under the same may take place and be conducted before the same or any other Judge according to the judicial arrangements in the Court for the time being, and a single Judge shall be entitled to act as the Court with reference to all petitions for admission as a law-agent under this Act." Held that a reclaiming note against the judgment of the Lord Ordinary was competent. Robertson, July 18, 1876, p. 1104.

Reclaiming—Court of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 100), sec. 28—A. S. 10*th March* 1870, secs. 1, 2.

10. Held that an interlocutor renewing an order for proof was an allowance of proof, and might be reclaimed against without leave within six days. Clark v. M'Allister, June 6, 1876, p. 780.

Suspension—Court of Session Act, 1850 (13 and 14 Vict. c. 36), secs. 9, 32.

11. Held that sec. 32 of the Court of Session Act, 1850, did not override sec. 9, and was not applicable to suspensions covered by sec. 9, viz. cases in which answers have been lodged, and that in such cases the record fell to be made up in the Outer-House as in an ordinary action. Scott's Executors v. Hepburn, June 14, 1876, p. 816.

Appeal—Expenses.

12. Circumstances in which £5, 5s. of expenses were allowed the respondent in an appeal, in respect that the appeal had not been timeously withdrawn. Johnston v. Rae, June 24, 1876, p. 879.

Pupil. Special Case.

13. Held that the Court could not entertain a special case presented by certain persons for their own interest, and also as tutors for pupil children having an adverse interest. Park v. Park, June 15, 1876, p. 850.

Jury Trial or Proof.

Petition for Service—Appeal for Jury Trial.

14. When a petitioner for service appeals for jury trial from the Sheriff of PROCESS—Continued.

Chancery under the 41st section of the Titles to Land Act, 1868, the Court will consider whether the case is suitable for jury trial, but the appellant has a right to jury trial unless cause is shewn to the contrary. It is not a sufficient reason for refusing jury trial that the evidence in the case mainly consists of a large mass of correspondence and other documentary evidence as to pedigree. Mackintosh v. Ross, Dec. 7, 1875, p. 232.

Jury Trial—Proof.

15. In an action brought by an insurance company to reduce a policy of life assurance on the ground of false statements by the insured, held that it was expedient that the case should be tried by a Lord Ordinary without a jury. Scottish Widows' Fund v. Buist, &c., July 14, 1876, p. 1078.

Jury Trial.

16. Where a case of damages was withdrawn from a jury by a joint minute for the parties agreeing that the jury should assess the damages, leaving the question of legal liability to the Court on the record and notes of evidence, but the Judge's notes bore that at the request of the parties he had asked the jury their opinion on a particular question of fact in the case, held that the Court was not bound by the jury's expression of opinion on that point. Adams v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co., Dec. 7, 1875, p. 215.

Jury Trial.

17. Pro forma jury trial to enable an appeal to be taken to the House of Lords against the disallowance of a bill of exceptions on the subject of which the Court had already expressed an opinion. Harrisons v. Anderston Foundry Co., Jan. 20, 1876, p. 386.

See Appeal—Expenses—Interdict—Proof—Pupil—Res Judicata—Sheriff.

PROOF. Contract—Parole.

1. When a contract has been embodied in a formal deed it is not competent to modify its terms by parole evidence that the intention of the parties was different from that set forth in the deed. Steuart's Trustees v. Hart, Dec. 22, 1875, p. 192.

Implied Admission—Carrier.

2. In an action against a railway company for non-delivery of goods, held that a denial by the company that they received the goods was not an implied admission that they did not deliver them to the consignee. Cruickshank, Fraser, and Co. v. Caledonian Railway Co., Feb. 25, 1876, p. 484.

Reference to Oath—Retractation of Reference.

3. It is competent for the Court to allow a minute of reference to oath to be withdrawn, but it is a question for the discretion of the Court, and leave will be refused, not only in cases where the party has made the reference from improper motives, but also where, in consequence of the reference (through delay or otherwise), the opposite party has been put to a disadvantage. Dick v. Hutton, Feb. 17, 1876, p. 448.

Reference to Oath—Evidence Act, 1853, sec. 5.

4. Where a pursuer had been examined as a witness for himself, and had been cross-examined on the merits of the cause by the defender, the Court refused to sustain a reference to the pursuer's oath. Macleay v. Campbell, July 8, 1876, p. 999.

Custom.

5. Proof of what generally happens is not necessarily proof of custom. Brown v. M'Connel, June 7, 1876, p. 788.

Witness—Adultery—Criminating Questions—37 and 38 Vict. c. 64, sec. 2.

6. The provision of the Evidence Further Amendment Act, 1874, that "no witness shall be liable to be asked or bound to answer any question tending to shew that he has been guilty of adultery," is solely for the protection of the witness, and if he is willing to answer such a question the defender in an action for divorce has no right to object to its being put or answered.

Observations by the Lord President on the duty of the Judge in such cases. Kirkwood v. Kirkwood, Dec. 9, 1875, p. 235.

See Lease, 2, 3—Parent and Child, 2, 3, 4.

PROPERTY. Gable.

1. The customary rule according to which the owner of one of several adjoining lots of ground feued or sold for building a continuous street is entitled to erect his gable to the extent of one-half its thickness upon the adjoining lot without consent of the proprietor, and to be reimbursed half the cost of the gable by that proprietor when he comes to use the gable, proceeds on implied contract inferred from a feuing plan or other circumstances, and where there are no facts from which an implied contract can be inferred (as in rural or villa subjects), no such rule exists, and the builder of a tenement must build it entirely upon his own ground. Begg, &c. v. Jack, Oct. 26, 1875, p. 35.

Mutual Gable.

2. A proprietor of a piece of ground in the suburbs of Edinburgh, without consent of the conterminous proprietor, and pending unsuccessful negotiations as to the terms on which consent should be given, took down an old mutual garden wall between the subjects, and erected on the site a gable of four stories. Held, in an action of declarator and removal against him at the instance of the conterminous proprietor, that the defender's operations were illegal, but that the Court had the power to impose equitable conditions on which the gable should be allowed to stand, and that in the circumstances the use of the gable by the pursuer, when he came to build on his own ground, without payment, would be a sufficient indemnification for the use which had been taken without agreement of his ground. Begg, &c. v. Jack, Oct. 26, 1875, p. 35.

Servitude—Shop Sign—Implied Grant.

3. A proprietor of a tenement of houses, consisting of a shop story and three upper stories above the shop, when in the personal occupation of the shop story erected wooden panels above the window and door of the shop to receive his name and sign, which panels extended beyond the middle of the joists of the floor separating the shop story from the one above it. These panels were afterwards used for the same purpose by successive tenants of the shop. The tenant of the shop purchased the shop story and took a disposition of the subject "as presently occupied" by himself. The upper stories were purchased by another person. Held that there was no implied grant in favour of the disponee of the shop of the right to use the panels beyond the middle of the joists. Alexander v. Butchart, Nov. 24, 1875, p. 156.

Superior and Vassal—Conditions in Feu—Mutuality of Obligations between Co-Feuars—Jus quæsitum tertio.

4. A feu-contract of an area of ground in a suburban district contained an obligation on the vassal that the villas or other buildings to be erected thereon should be built with stone and lime. This obligation was embodied in the titles of two disponees to whom adjoining stances on the feu were conveyed. Held that the proprietor of one stance had a title and interest to insist upon the removal of a brick stable erected upon the other stance, although a man of skill, to whom the Court remitted, reported that the injury to the complainer's property would practically be the same if the building were of stone. Beattie v. Ures, March 18, 1876, p. 634.

Runrig and Rundale—Kavels.

5. Circumstances in which held—1st, That the title of two parties, each to one-half of an estate held in kavels by way of runrig or rundale, was not pro indiviso but separate and exclusive property, and continued to be so after the kavels were massed together and the whole divided into two continuous portions by decreet-arbitral; 2d, That the title to the salmon and other fishings ex adverso of what had been the respective kavels of the two proprietors was separate and exclusive, and not pro indiviso subsequent to the date of the decreet-arbitral, but opinions equally divided as to whether the title to the fishings had ever been otherwise than separate and exclusive.

Observations (per Lord Deas) explanatory of the law and practice of dividing an estate by way of runrig or rundale into two halves, called the sunny half and the shady half. Baroness Gray v. Richardson and Others, July 14, 1876, p. 1031.

PROPERTY—Continued.
See Division and Sale—Fishings—Minerals—Nuisance—Servitude—Superior and Vassal.

PUBLIC BURDEN. Clause of Relief—Superior and Vassal—Landlord and Tenant.
1. A feu-charter dated in 1814 contained the following clause:—"During the existence of the present feu-right all public and parochial burdens or taxes imposed or to be imposed shall be paid by the superior and vassal as if the former was proprietor and landlord and as if the latter was tenant under him." Held, in an action by the vassal for relief of all poor-rates payable in respect of property, that the superior was only bound to relieve the vassal of poor-rates on the annual value of the feu-duty. Smith, Laing, and Co. v. Maitland, &c., Jan. 7, 1876, p. 281.

Clause of Relief—School-Rates—35 and 36 Vict. c. 62, Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, secs. 43 and 44.
2. In a disposition the granter bound himself to free and relieve the disponee of, inter alia, "all schoolmaster's salary and road-money payable for the lands and others hereby disponed, from henceforth and in all time coming." Held that the obligation to relieve of schoolmaster's salary did not apply to school-rates imposed under the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872. Steuart v. Earl of Seafield, March 1, 1876, p. 518.

Clause of Relief—Road-Money.
3. Held by Lord Young that the general assessment imposed under the Banffshire Roads Act, 1866, was covered by the obligation to relieve of "road-money." Steuart v. Earl of Seafield, March 1, 1876, p. 518.

PUBLIC HEALTH. See Police—Nuisance.

PUPIL. Authority to Feu.
1. Circumstances in which the Court granted authority to a father, as administrator-in-law of his pupil son, to feu part of the son's estate. Lord Clinton, Oct. 20, 1875, p. 62.

Special Case.
2. Held that the Court could not entertain a special case presented by certain persons for their own interest, and also as tutors for pupil children having an adverse interest. Park v. Park, June 15, 1876, p. 850.

RAILWAY. Lease—Right of Tenant to Compensation—Possession.
1. Notice by a railway company of their intention to take under their statutory powers a portion of a farm was served upon the agents of the proprietor about one o'clock on the day on which the landlord signed a lease of the farm (previously signed by the tenant) with entry at the ensuing term. There was no evidence as to the hour at which the landlord signed the lease. Held that a claim by the tenant against the railway company for compensation for loss of tenant's profits was excluded, upon the ground that he had failed to prove that there was a completed personal contract of lease between him and his landlord at the time when the notice to take was served, and that it was therefore unnecessary to determine whether possession under the lease was necessary to entitle the tenant to compensation. North British Railway Company v. Lindsay, Nov. 30, 1875, p. 168.

Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. c. 31), sec. 7—"Just and Reasonable Condition"—Detention of Perishable Goods.
2. A railway company gave consignors of fish the option of having their goods carried at a rate lower than the ordinary rate for fish, upon condition of the consignor undertaking by special contract to relieve the company of all liability for delay, except upon proof that the detention "arose from the wilful fault or negligence of the company's servants." In an action at the instance of the consignor of fish at the lower rate, in which he claimed damages for detention of the fish, held that the special contract was just and reasonable within the meaning of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, and had the effect of throwing upon the pursuer the burden of proving fault on the part of the company; but, upon the evidence, that fault had been proved against the company. M'Connachie v. Great North of Scotland Railway Co., Nov. 6, 1875, p. 79.

RAILWAY—Continued.

Contract of Haulage.

3. When a railway company undertakes to haul along their line waggons belonging to private traders, the extent of their obligation is to use reasonable care and diligence. Watson v. North British Railway Co., March 13, 1876, p. 637.

Railway Clauses (Scotland) Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. c. 33), sec. 90—Tolls—Lien.

4. Held that the word "tolls" as used in the 90th section of the Railway Clauses (Scotland) Act, 1845, was to be construed as meaning tolls proper, or payments for the use of the line by persons using their own carriages, and therefore that the remedies given by that section were not available for the recovery of charges for goods carried by the railway company as common carriers. Highland Railway Co. v. Jackson, June 16, 1876, p. 850.

See Carrier—Partnership, 3—Reparation, 1.

REDUCTION. See Issue—Sale, 1.

REGISTRATION ACT. 17 and 18 Vict. cap. 80, sec. 55—Burnt Registers.
Procedure followed in restoring parish registers which had been destroyed. Dundas, Dec. 17, 1875, p. 273.

RELIEF. See Lease, 6—Public Burden.

REPARATION. Culpa—Collaborateur—Railway.

1. Held (1) that a railway company were liable for injuries caused by the fault of a station-master in their employment to a fireman on the train of another railway company using their line under running powers; and (2) that the claim was not barred by contributory negligence on the part of the engine-driver on the train and of another fellow-workman of the fireman. Adams v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company, Dec. 7, 1875, p. 215.

Culpa—Opus Manufactum—Nuisance.

2. A company of ironmasters in the course of their trade accumulated on their premises an enormous bing of refuse from an ironstone pit, composed of combustible materials, which, from some unexplained cause, took fire. In an action by a neighbouring farmer against the ironmasters to recover damages for injuries caused by noxious vapours emitted from the burning bing, held (1) that the defenders by forming such an opus manufactum had rendered themselves liable for the consequences without proof of specific fault; and (2) that fault had been proved. Chalmers v. Dixon, Feb. 18, 1876, p. 461.

Culpa—Harbour Trustees—Ship.

3. After a vessel had left its moorings in a tidal harbour the keel and bottom were found to have sustained injuries. A stone was found fixed in the mud at the spot where the vessel had rested. Held that assuming the stone had caused the injuries the harbour trustees were not liable in damages, as they had taken all reasonable means to make the harbour safe, and no fault or negligence of themselves or their servants had been established. Thomson, &c. v. Greenock Harbour Trustees, July 20, 1876, p. 1194.

Liability of Police Commissioners for Negligence of Contractor employed by them.

4. A person raised an action of damages against the police commissioners of a burgh for injuries sustained by him from having fallen over a heap of rubbish left upon the street after night-fall and not fenced or lighted. The defence was that the commissioners, under the powers conferred upon them by the Police Act, had contracted with a person for the cleaning of the streets and removal of refuse, and accordingly that, if there was negligence on the part of any one, it was the contractor who was liable, and not the commissioners. Held, upon the terms of the contract, that the commissioners retained a complete control over the execution of the operations contracted for, and were not relieved from the obligation incumbent on them to remove the rubbish or to put it in a state free of danger to the lieges. Stephen v. Thurso Police Commissioners, March 3, 1876, p. 535.

REPARATION—Continued.

Probable Cause—Relevancy.

5. A pursuer will not be allowed an issue of malice and want of probable cause when the Court are satisfied from the pursuer's own statements that the defender had probable cause. Craig v. Peebles, Feb. 16, 1875, p. 441.

Public Prosecutor—Probable Cause.

6. A Justice of Peace Court convicted a person, who held a public house certificate, of selling spirits without a certificate, in respect of his continuing to sell spirits within the licenced premises eight days after they had been rendered uninhabitable by fire. The conviction was afterwards suspended by the Court of Justiciary on the ground that the Justices had mistaken the law. In an action of damages raised by the suspender against the procurator-fiscal on the ground that he had presented the complaint maliciously and without probable cause, held that the above facts, as disclosed in the pursuer's statement, shewed that the case was a fair one for trial, and negatived the pursuer's averment of want of probable cause, and that the defender was entitled to absolvitor. Craig v. Peebles, Feb. 16, 1876, p. 441.

See Arrestment, 1—Bankruptcy, 2—Carrier—Interdict, 3—Lease, 6, 7, 8, 10—Master and Servant—Railway, 2, 3—Ship, 5.

RES JUDICATA. Canon Law—Consistorial Cause.

1. The rule of the canon law that decrees against marriage do not pass in rem judicatam was not adopted by, and forms no part of, the law of Scotland. Lockyer v. Ferryman, &c., June 28, 1876, p. 882.

Summons.

2. A raised an action of declarator of marriage, and in the summons, as originally framed, laid his case on de præsenti acknowledgment. Afterwards, in revising the condescendence, he added an averment of promise subsequente copula. In the course of the action an interlocutor was pronounced expressly allowing him an opportunity of proving the alleged copula, but he adduced no evidence. Decree of absolvitor was pronounced. A, after an interval of thirty years, raised another action of declarator of marriage against the representatives of the former defender, who had died, and specially averred copula in his condescendence. Held that this action was barred exceptione rei judicatæ, the grounds of action having been disposed of in the former case. Lockyer v. Ferryman, &c., June 28, 1876, p. 882.

RETENTION. See Lease, 10.

REVENUE. Property and Income Tax Act, 1842, 5 and 6 Vict. c. 35, schedule B—Deer Forest—Assessment.

1. The lessee of a deer forest is liable to be assessed under schedule B of the Property and Income Tax Act, in respect of occupancy, to the extent of the rent actually paid, and not merely to the extent of the rent which the land would yield if let for pastoral or agricultural purposes. Middleton v. Lord Advocate, March 16, 1876, p. 599.

Statute 5 and 6 Vict. c. 35 (Property and Income Tax Act, 1842), sec. 100, sch. D.

2. The Glasgow Corporation Gas Act, 1869, authorised the corporation to acquire certain gas-works, and to manufacture and sell gas to the inhabitants. The Act provided that the surplus revenue, after payment of annuities and interest of debt, should be applied to a sinking fund to reduce the debt, and to the general purposes of the corporation. Held that the corporation was liable to be assessed for income-tax under schedule D upon such surplus revenue. Glasgow Gas Commissioners v. Inland Revenue, June 20, 1876, p. 857.

REVENUE—Continued.

REVOCATION, IMPLIED. See Succession, 13.

RIGHT IN SECURITY. Bankruptcy—Trust-Deed—Agent and Principal.
1. A granted a trust-deed for behoof of all acceding creditors in favour of R, and afterwards entered into an arrangement to pay a composition in four instalments, he being allowed to carry on his business, but subject to the supervision of B until the first instalment should be paid. The first two instalments were paid, but when A failed to pay the third B took possession of his shop and goods, and sold off everything for behoof of the creditors in the trust-deed. A had in the period after granting the trust-deed purchased and paid for some goods from C, but at the date when B took possession he was owing C the price of certain other goods, a portion of which were then in his shop. C, after obtaining decree against A for the price of the goods, sued B also for the price as really the principal in the transaction. Held that A not having been divested, and the trust-deed having been a mere security for payment of the composition, B was not in any sense a principal in the transaction, and that A alone was liable for the price of the goods. Miller v. Downie, March 4, 1876, p. 548.

Assignation.
2. The creditor in a bond and disposition in security granted an assignation, inter alia, of the heritable subjects disponed in the bond, but did not expressly assign the bond itself or the debt; the assignation, however, bore to be "in real security of" the sum in the bond. The assignation contained an assignation of writs conform to inventory, in which inventory the bond was included. The bond was not delivered to the assignee, but a copy was. Three years after the date of the assignation the estates of the creditor were sequestrated, and his trustee completed his title to the bond by recording a notarial instrument two years after the assignee had been infeft in the subjects. In a competition between the assignee and the trustee, held that the assignation was valid and effectual to convey the debt as well as the security. M'Cutcheon v. M'William, March 8, 1876, p. 565.

Statute 37 and 38 Vict. cap. 94, sec. 25—Sasine—Recording.
3. Where the holder of a security over certain heritable subjects, originally burgage but feued out by the magistrates, had, prior to the Conveyancing Act, 1874, recorded his infeftment in the Burgh Register, and his title was therefore objected to, opinion (per Lord Curriehill) that the provisions of the 25th section applied, and that the title was a good one. M'Cutcheon v. M'William, March 8, 1876, p. 565.

See Fraud, 1—Pointing the Ground.

RIVER. See Nuisance.

ROAD. Possessory Judgment—Interdict—Sheriff.
1. In 1815 district road trustees shut up a public road, and the proprietor of the solum enclosed, planted, and cultivated it, but the public continued to use it as a public footpath by forcing through the fences and walking on the cultivated ground. In cross petitions in the Sheriff Court for interdict at the instance respectively of the proprietor and some members of the public, the latter of whom challenged the legality of the proceedings of the trustees in shutting up the road, held that, although the public had proved possession of the footpath for seven years prior to the date of the petitions, that possession was not sufficient to entitle them to a possessory judgment, in respect that the proceedings of the road trustees, as shewn by their minutes, were prima facie evidence that the possession of the public was unlawful. M'Kerron, &c. v. Gordon, Feb. 15, 1876, p. 429.

ROAD—Continued.

Public Footpath—Obstructions—Gates—Sheriff.

2. Held (1) that the proprietor of lands through which a public footpath ran, or his tenant with his leave, was, as in the case of servitude roads, entitled, for grazing purposes, to put swing wicket gates across the footpath, provided that the gates were not of an obstructive character; (2) that this right being one meræ facultatis could not be lost non utendo; (3) that it was within the jurisdiction of the Sheriff to grant interdict against interference with such gates recently erected, although for the seven preceding years, and from time immemorial, the public had enjoyed the use of the footpath without gates. Sutherland v. Thomson, Feb. 29, 1876, p. 485.

See Lease, 4—Public Burden, 3.

RUNRIG. See Property, 5.

SALE. Contract—Reduction—Essential Error.

1. A proprietor sold part of his ground for £75, believing it to be burdened with the cumulo feu-duty of £9, 15s. The purchaser knew that the portion effeiring to it was only 3s., and was aware of the seller's mistake. The disposition was revised by the seller's agent. The purchaser took possession and laid out several hundred pounds on the property. In an action by the seller for reduction of the disposition, and restitution, or alternatively for decree that the purchaser was bound to relieve the seller of the feu-duty of £9, 15s., and that that sum should be declared to be a real burden on the part sold, and that warrant should be granted to record decree to that effect in the Register of Sasines, the Lord Ordinary decerned in terms of the second alternative conclusions. Held that it was incompetent so to reform the contract, but decree of reduction and restitution granted on condition that the pursuer reimbursed the defender for his outlay on permanent additions to or improvements of the subjects. Steuart's Trustees v. Hart, Dec. 2, 1875, p. 192.

Principal and Agent—Usage of Trade—Proof—Parole.

2. Terms of letters held not to import a concluded contract of sale. Held incompetent to examine the brokers who had acted (by letter) for the parties as to whether the contract had been concluded by them or not, the correspondence falling to be construed by the Court. Towill and Co. v. The British Agricultural Association, Nov. 12, 1875, p. 117.

Suspensive Condition—Delivery—Bankrupt.

3. A quantity of flax was sold at a certain price, "draft at four months from this date." The goods were forwarded by railway on the evening of a Friday, and were delivered at the buyer's warehouse next morning, when they were received into stock and partly used by the buyer's manager without his knowledge. On the same day, Saturday, a letter of advice, invoice, and bill were posted by the sellers, and received by the buyer at his private residence after business hours. The buyer on calling at his works on Monday morning, for the first time learned that the goods had arrived, but before he had given any instructions regarding them he received a letter from his banker restricting his credit to an extent which obliged him to stop payment. The buyer then directed the goods to be put aside, and did not accept the bill. In a question between the sellers and the trustee for the buyer's creditors, held (1) that the acceptance of the bill was a suspensive condition of the sale, and that, until it was implemented, delivery of the goods did not pass the property; (2) that the sellers had not waived their right to insist upon the condition by forwarding the goods before receiving the acceptance; and, therefore (3), that the sellers were entitled to restitution of the goods. Brandt and Co. v. Dickson, Jan. 18, 1876, p. 375.

Disposition—Warrandice.

4. Held, upon the terms of the dispositive clause of a disposition, which contained a clause of absolute warrandice, that in regard to one of the subjects mentioned in the dispositive clause the seller had only undertaken to place the purchaser in his place, and had neither disponed or warranted the subjects. Leith Heritages Co. v. Edinburgh and Leith Glass Co., June 7, 1876, p. 789.

SALE—Continued.

Warrandice.

5. Opinions, That, in considering a claim of damages for breach of warrandice, the Court is entitled to look beyond the technicalities of conveyancing language, and to refuse the claim if it shall appear that the bargain, as the parties understood and intended it, was fulfilled. Leith Heritages Co. v. Edinburgh and Leith Glass Co., June 7, 1876, p. 789.

Advertisement—Feu-Duty—Warrandice.

6. A villa was advertised for sale. After a description of the subjects, the advertisement contained the following words, "Feu-duty, £9," and concluded, "For further particulars apply to A B, in whose hands are the title-deeds and articles of roup." An intending purchaser, without applying to the agent named, addressed to the seller a written offer for the villa "as advertised," which was accepted. The titles shewed that the payment of £9 formed part of cumulo prestations amounting to £46, 19s., which affected a larger area of which the subjects formed part, and which had never been allocated. Held that the purchaser could not compel the seller to procure an allocation of the burdens or to insert in the disposition to be granted a clause warranting the purchaser against liability for a larger sum than £9 a-year, but was bound to accept a disposition in ordinary form. Nisbet v. Smith, June 6, 1876, p. 781.

See Contract.

SCHOOL. Review—Board of Education—Education Act, 1872, sec. 28.

1. A school board resolved that it was necessary to provide additional school accommodation, and this resolution was confirmed by the Board of Education. Thereafter the school board resolved that in consequence of sufficient interim accommodation having been provided the carrying out of the former resolution should be delayed. The school board having subsequently refused to comply with a requisition of the Board of Education to carry out their original resolution, the Court, on a petition and complaint at the instance of the Lord Advocate under sec. 36 of the Education Act, 1872, ordained the school board to comply with the requisition. Lord Advocate v. Stow School Board, Feb. 19, 1876, p. 469.

Burgh School—Education Act, 1872, sec. 46.

2. Held that the annual sum payable by the town-council of a burgh out of the common good to the school board, under section 46 of the Education Act, 1872, was a fair average of what the burgh school had actually cost the burgh, and that in computing this average retiring allowances to teachers and expenditure upon the school buildings were to be taken into account. School Board of Dunbar v. Magistrates and Town-Council of Dunbar, March 18, 1876, p. 631.

Dismissal of Schoolmaster—Malice—Education Act, 1872, sec. 60, sub-sec. 2.

3. The Court of Session has power to inquire into alleged deviations from the statutory procedure in the dismissal of a schoolmaster appointed prior to the Education Act, 1872, but not to review the judgment of the school board on the merits. Averments of malice against the school board in forming their judgment upon the inspector's report are irrelevant as a ground of reduction of their judgment. Macfarlane v. Mochrum School Board and Others, Nov. 9, 1875, p. 88.

Dismissal of Schoolmaster—Education Act, 1872, sec. 55—Notice.

4. Held that although in terms of the Education Act, 1872, a schoolmaster held office only during the pleasure of the school board, he was entitled to reasonable notice before dismissal, or to a money payment in lieu thereof. Morrison v. Abernethy School Board, July 3, 1876, p. 945.

SCHOOL—Continued.

Education Act, 1872, secs. 37 and 38—Transfer of School to School Board—Endowed School.

5. Held that the provisions of the Education Act, 1872, which prevent a school board acquiring by purchase or lease a school "erected or acquired, and maintained, or partly maintained, with funds derived from contributions or donations (whether by the members of a particular church or religious body or not) for the purpose, or authorised by the contributors or donors to be applied for the purpose of promoting education," apply only to "subscription" schools, and did not render illegal the lease to a school board of a school erected and maintained by an ancient endowment. M'Culloch, &c. v. Kirk-Session and Heritors of Dalry, July 20, 1876, p. 1182.

Trust—Mortification—School Board—Cy Pres.

6. Terms of an agreement between the trustees under an old mortification for "the erection of a free grammar school," and the school board of the parish sanctioned by the Court as carrying out as far as possible the founder's intentions. M'Culloch, &c. v. Kirk-Session and Heritors of Dalry, July 20, 1876, p. 1182.

SERVITUDE. Implied Grant—Ish and Entry.

1. The proprietor of a piece of urban ground sold a portion of it, the occupants of which had always enjoyed an access through the remaining portion, which the proprietor retained. In a question with the purchaser, held that there was an implied grant of the right of access. Walton Brothers v. Magistrates of Glasgow, July 20, 1876, p. 1130.

Confusio.

2. Opinion (per Lord President) that when two properties, standing on separate titles, and one having a servitude of passage over the other, are united in the person of one proprietor, the servitude is not in all circumstances extinguished confusione to the effect of making it necessary to constitute the servitude de novo when the proprietor alienates the original dominant tenement. Walton Brothers v. Magistrates of Glasgow, July 20, 1876, p. 1130.

Access.

3. Circumstances in which held that an obligation to construct an access to certain subjects in a town "in a proper and sufficient manner, so as to admit of a carriage or cart to pass thereon," was not implemented by leaving a passage nine feet wide, the passage so left being an access to dwelling-houses having doors in the passage as well as to the subjects behind, and a minimum width of twelve feet fixed. Cooper and M'Leod v. Edinburgh Improvement Trustees, &c., July 18, 1876, p. 1106.

Real Burden.

4. The front portion of certain house property was sold, the seller retaining the back portion. The disposition, which was duly recorded in the Register of Sasines, contained an obligation upon the purchaser forthwith to construct at his own expense a sufficient access from the street to the back portion, but the position and width of the stipulated access were not defined. The purchaser resold the subjects without having constructed a sufficient access, stipulating that his disponee should not be entitled to inspect the titles, and not giving him notice of the obligation in question. Held in an action by the proprietor of the back portion against the original purchaser of the front portion and his disponee that an effectual servitude of passage had been constituted. Cooper and M'Leod v. Edinburgh Improvement Trustees, &c., July 18, 1876, p. 1106.

See Minerals, 1—Property, 3.

SHERIFF. Lease—Jurisdiction.

1. An action to compel a person to implement a lease, by entering into possession and paying the rent, may competently proceed in the Sheriff Court, although the Sheriff may have to decide upon the constitution of the lease, in consequence of the defender's denial of its existence. Robertson v. Cockburn, Oct. 22, 1875, p. 21.

SHERIFF—Continued.

Process—Proof—Act of Sederunt 10th July 1839, sec. 83.

2. After a proof in an action of filiation had been closed, and judgment given for the defender by a Sheriff-substitute, the pursuer appealed to the Sheriff, and also lodged in process a petition for the examination of the pursuer's sister, which examination was allowed by the Sheriff. Held that the additional witness ought not, in the circumstances, to have been examined. Mabon v. Cairns, Oct. 29, 1875, p. 47.

Process—Jurisdiction—Small Debt Act (1 Vict. c. 41).

3. Held that it is competent for the Sheriff in the Small Debt Court to entertain an action by an inspector of poor for recovery of payments of aliment to a pauper not exceeding £12, notwithstanding that it may be necessary to determine incidentally the question of the pauper's settlement. Nixon v. Caldwell, June 1, 1876, Justiciary Cases, p. 31.

Jurisdiction—Poor, collection of assessment for—8 and 9 Vict. c. 83, sec. 88.

4. Held, in an action brought in the Sheriff Court by a parochial board for recovery of poor-rates, that the function of the Sheriff is not ministerial to interpone judicial authority for recovery of the assessment but judicial, and that it is competent for the Sheriff to entertain and decide questions as to the legality of the assessment. M'Tavish v. Commissioners of Caledonian Canal, Feb. 3, 1876, p. 412.

See Burgh, 2—Lease, 2, 5—Process, 2—Road.

SHIP. Charter-party—Demurrage—Lay-days.

1. A charter-party stipulated that the vessel should "proceed to a loading berth in Leith docks, as ordered, and there load in ten working days, as customary, a full and complete cargo of steam coals." On 16th April the master intimated to the charterers that the ship, then lying at a loading berth, was ready to receive her cargo. The charterers had, however, entered her in the dockmaster's books for a crane berth, for which the vessel had to wait her turn till 3d May. In an action for demurrage, held that under the charter-party the charterers had the choice of a loading berth, but that the lay-days commenced to run from 17th April, when the loading might have been commenced. Dall' Orso v. Mason and Co., Feb. 4, 1876, p. 419.

Powers of Master—Liability of Owners for Repairs—Bottomry—Maritime Risk—Agent and Principal.

2. Held that persons who acted as owners of a ship, although not registered as such, by assuming the control of her, and appointing the captain, were liable for advances made on their credit to the captain for necessary repairs at a foreign port, and that this liability was not affected by the captain having granted, as an additional security, a bond which the majority of the Court were of opinion was not a valid bottomry bond. Miller and Co. v. Potter, Wilson, and Co., Nov. 9, 1875, p. 105.

Powers of Managing Owners—Liability for Furnishings.

3. When a vessel is in a home port, and the owners easily accessible, the managing part-owner cannot, without specific authority, bind his co-owners for extensive structural alterations. Steele and Co. v. Dixon, &c., July 8, 1876, p. 1003.

Carriage of Goods—Delivery—Risk.

4. Where goods are shipped for delivery at a certain port the general rule is that delivery of each bale is complete as soon as it passes over the ship's side into the hands of the harbour porters employed for the consignee. British Shipowners' Co. (Limited) v. Grimond, July 4, 1876, p. 968.

Collision—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, sec. 388—Reparation—Compulsory Pilotage.

5. To entitle the owners of a ship, under the charge of a licensed pilot, where such pilotage is compulsory, to the benefit of the provision of the statute which exempts them from liability when a collision has occurred by the fault of the pilot, it is sufficient for them to prove that the accident was occasioned by his fault, unless the facts proved raise a presumption of contributory fault on the part of the shipowners, which requires to be rebutted.

SHIP—Continued.

Circumstances in which held (aff. judgment of the Second Division) that a collision had been caused by the fault of the pilot, and that there was no contributory fault on the part of the owners. Clyde Navigation Trustees v. Barclay, Curle, and Co., May 23, 1876, H. L., p. 44.

See Carrier—Insurance, 1, 2—Reparation, 3.

SHIPBROKER'S COMMISSION. See Agent and Principal, 2.

SPECIAL CASE. See Pupil, 2.

STATUTE. Edinburgh Street Tramways Acts, 1871 and 1874, 34 and 35 Vict. cap. lxxxix., sec. 44, and 37 and 38 Vict. cap. lxviii., sec. 4.

A tramway company was bound by an agreement, embodied in its Act of incorporation, not to charge passengers more than 1d. per mile or fraction of a mile (minimum charge for each passenger being 2d.) They afterwards obtained an Act by which they were relieved of their obligation to lay certain lines, and were allowed instead to run omnibuses over these routes. This Act allowed them to charge "a sum not exceeding 2d. per mile for first-class passengers on omnibus routes and any tramway routes worked in connection therewith." Held that the second Act did not alter the rates chargeable for tramway passengers who did not use the omnibus routes. Edinburgh Street Tramways Co. v. Torbain, May 18, 1876, p. 655.

STATUTES.

1696, c. 25. See Trust.
17 and 18 Vict., c. 80. See Registration Act.
29 and 30 Vict., c. 118. See Industrial Schools Act.
33 and 34 Vict., c. 92, Municipal Elections (Scotland) Acts. See Burgh.
34 and 35 Vict., c. 56. See Dogs Act.
35 and 36 Vict., c. 62, Education Act. See School.
37 and 38 Vict., c. 34, Evidence Act, 1874. See Proof.
37 and 38 Vict., c. 94, sec. 25. See Right in Security, 3.

SUCCESSION. Mortis Causa Settlement—Extrinsic Evidence.

1. In the construction of a will observed,—

1. That it was an important element of interpretation that the words of conveyance employed were not at the date of the will habile to convey heritage in Scotland, though they afterwards became so by a change in the law several years before the testator's death.

2. That instructions to prepare a mortis causa deed are not admissible in construing the deed as evidence of the testator's intention.

3. That deeds and holograph writings made subsequently are admissible as evidence. Farquhar v. Farquhar's Executors, Nov. 3, 1875, p. 71.

Vesting—Trust—Beneficial Fee.

2. In a trust-settlement the trustees were directed to lay out the residue of the truster's estate (which amounted to £60,000) in the purchase of lands, and when the whole residue, or within £300 thereof, was so invested, to deliver a disposition of the lands to the truster's brother (who predeceased her) in liferent, and his son and the heirs whatsoever of his body in fee, whom failing, certain other persons, the trustees being declared to be "the sole and exclusive judges of the lands which, and the period when these should be purchased, free from the control of any of the heirs who may be interested therein." The trustees having invested all the residue except £20,000 in the purchase of lands, the truster's nephew raised an action against the trustees for declarator that he was entitled to payment of the £20,000 as his absolute property. Held (1) that the pursuer's rights as a beneficiary vested in him a morte testatoris; and (2) that, as the directions to the trustees to purchase lands were framed for the purpose of settling them on the pursuer as an unlimited fiar, and were not such as to confer a right on third parties, the pursuer was entitled to require payment of the £20,000 in cash. Spens v. Monypenny's Trustees, Oct. 29, 1875, p. 50.

SUCCESSION—Continued.

Vesting.

3. A testator directed his trustees to pay to his widow out of the free income of his estate an annuity of £150, and to divide the surplus annual income of his whole estate equally among his three sons nominatim, the lawful issue of any deceasing being entitled to their parent's share. He further directed his trustees to divide the residue equally among his three sons "or the survivors of them, at such times and in such manner" as his trustees might think proper. Held that the residue vested in the sons at the testator's death. Henderson's Trustees v. Henderson, Jan. 8, 1876, p. 320.

Implied Direction to Convey.

4. The testator further directed his trustees on the death of his widow "to hold for and pay over to" his eldest son, whom failing, to his lawful children, equally among them, the free rents of a special heritable subject. After a similar provision for each of his two younger sons the testator directed that in the event of any of his sons dying and leaving issue the trustees should "hold and apply the free annual rents of the property hereby directed to be conveyed to such of my said sons for behoof of such child or children" until the youngest attained the age of twenty-one, when the property should be conveyed to or divided among such children equally. Held that there was an implied direction to convey the three properties to the testator's three sons respectively in fee, and that their right vested at the testator's death. Henderson's Trustees v. Henderson, Jan. 8, 1876, p. 320.

Marriage-Contract.

5. Trustees found bound to denude in favour of the primary creditors upon liferentrix renouncing her interest. Grant v. Grant's Trustees, Jan. 4, 1876, p. 280.

Vesting—Nearest of Kin.

6. Two spouses made a mutual disposition of their whole estate by postnuptial contract, directing that the survivor should have the liferent of the whole, and that after his or her death the estate should pass to trustees, who were directed to divide it into two equal portions, and to pay or convey one to any persons to be appointed in writing by the husband, and "failing his executing such, to his nearest in kin equally." The husband predeceased, having made no appointment of legatees. Upon the death of the wife, held that the fee of the husband's half of the estate destined to his next of kin was intended to be given to those who should be his next of kin at the date of his death, and that upon his death without having exercised the power of appointment their interest vested. Ferrier v. Angus, Jan. 21, 1876, p. 396.

Vesting.

7. A testator, after directing payment of two annuities, and providing a liferent of the remainder of his estate to his wife, if she survived him, directed his trustees that the residue of his estate should, upon the death of his wife, or upon the death of the longest liver of the two annuitants, "whichever of these events shall last happen, but not earlier, be divided equally, share and share alike, among the children of my said two sisters, and if any child or children shall have died, either before the date of these presents or before the said period of division, then their issue shall, equally among them, succeed to their parent's share: Declaring that in the case of females, whether children or the issue of children, the provision in their favour shall be exclusive of the jus mariti or right of administration of any husbands whom they may have married or may marry, and as well in that case as in that of any of the other beneficiaries of the fee, even males, their provision shall be either paid to themselves upon their own receipt, or secured for their behoof by my said trustees and their aforesaids in such way as they in their sole discretion may think most fit for the interest of the beneficiaries." The testator's wife predeceased him. Held that the residue did not vest till the death of the last survivor of the annuitants. Sloane v. Finlayson, May 20, 1876, p. 678.

SUCCESSION—Continued.

Contingent Vesting—Fee and Liferent—Defeasible Fee—Resolutive Condition—Presumption of Life.

8. In 1816 a testator disponed heritage to his son, if in life, and the heirs of his body, whom failing, to the testator's daughters in liferent, and after the decease of the survivor of them, to his grandson (a bastard) and the heirs of his body, whom failing by predecease without issue, to the testator's nephew and his heirs in fee. It appeared from a proof that in 1802 the testator received information that his son, a sailor, then fourteen years of age, had been drowned abroad, and that nothing had occurred to throw doubt on the correctness of this information. The testator was survived by his daughters, his grandson, and his nephew. The grandson executed a conveyance of the heritage, but predeceased the liferenters without leaving issue. In an action of declarator brought by the representatives of his disponee, held (1) that the son (who would have been ninety years old if alive) was dead without issue; (2) that on the testator's death the fee vested in his nephew, subject to defeasance in the event of its appearing that the son survived the testator or left issue, and also in the event of the grandson surviving all the liferenters; and (3) that as the grandson predeceased the last survivor of the liferenters the fee never vested in him, and he had no power to convey. M'Lay v. Borland, July 19, 1876, p. 1124.

Conditio si sine liberis decesserit.

9. A testator bequeathed his whole estate to his father (who predeceased him), whom failing, to the testator's whole brothers and sisters nominatim. Held (1) that the conditio si sine liberis did not apply in favour of the issue of a brother who predeceased the testator; (2) that there was no partial intestacy, and that the surviving brothers and sisters were entitled to the whole fund. Blair's Executors, &c. v. Taylor, &c., Jan. 18, 1876, p. 362.

10. Circumstances in which the conditio si sine liberis was applied to a bequest by a person to the children of his brothers uterine in respect of the terms of the testament. Nicol v. Nicol's Executor, &c., Jan. 18, 1876, decided July 13, 1875, p. 374.

11. A truster bequeathed the liferent of her estate to her grandson A, with power to the trustees to make payments to him out of capital, and on his death the fee of the estate, or of so much as should remain, to A's issue, whom failing, to one of her nephews W, whom failing, to his two children nominatim, "and to the survivor of them, and failing both, to my own nearest heirs and assignees whomsoever." A died without issue. W and his children predeceased A, but W's children were survived by issue. Held, in a competition between W's grandchildren and the representatives of the next of kin of the truster, that the conditio si sine liberis did not apply. Gillespie v. Mercer, &c., March 8, 1876, p. 561.

Vesting.

12. A testator by holograph will expressed his wish that his whole estate should be liferented by his wife, and that at her death his moveable property should be equally divided between his younger children, "or, if dead, their nearest lawful heirs, share and share alike," and nominated trustees to carry out his intentions. Held that the younger children's shares vested at the testator's death. Jackson, &c. v. M'Millan, &c., March 18, 1876, p. 627.

Mutual Deed—Implied Revocation, terms of—Investment—Parole Proof.

13. Two sisters executed a mutual deed and settlement, giving their whole property each to the other in liferent, and to certain beneficiaries in fee, but reserving power to each to alter during their respective lives. Thereafter their whole funds were reinvested under the superintendence of two friends, and the new investments were taken in terms such as to confer an absolute title of property on the survivor. The surviving sister having left

SUCCESSION—Continued.

a new settlement, conveying her whole means to trustees, in a competition between the beneficiaries under the mutual settlement and those under the later settlement, as to the property of the predeceasing sister, held (1) that it was competent to prove by parole evidence that the sisters had given no authority to change the terms of the investments; and (2) upon proof that no such authority had been given, that the predeceasing sister's property still remained under the operation of the mutual settlement. Renton's Trustees v. Alison, July 20, 1876, p. 1142.

See Fee and Liferent—Foreign, 1—Heritable and Moveable.

SUPERIOR AND VASSAL. Obligation—Relief—Public Burden—Landlord and Tenant.

1. A feu-charter dated in 1814 contained the following clause:—"During the existence of the present feu-right all public and parochial burdens or taxes imposed or to be imposed shall be paid by the superior and vassal as if the former was proprietor and landlord and as if the latter was tenant under him." Held, in an action by the vassal for relief of all poor-rates payable in respect of property, that the superior was only bound to relieve the vassal of poor-rates on the annual value of the feu-duty.

Observations (per Lord President and Lord Deas) as to the competency of looking behind a feu-charter at other and prior documents with a view to construing the charter. Smith, Laing, and Co. v. Maitland, &c., Jan. 7, 1876, p. 281.

Reddendo—Conversion of Victual Feu-Duty—Bear or Barley.

2. The reddendo of certain lands in the county of Fife, held under a charter of date 1622, was a victual feu-duty of "three chalders bear, guid and sufficient stuff." After proof that the vassals had been in use for upwards of a century to pay this victual feu-duty converted in whole or in part at the rate of the barley fiars, at first, of Midlothian, and latterly of Fife, held that the term "bear" occurring in deeds of the date of the original charter of 1622 applied equally to bear and barley, and that the usage of payment determined that the victual feu-duty was to be paid in barley, or converted at the Fife fiars prices for barley. Ferguson's Trustees v. Magistrates of Kinghorn, Jan. 27, 1876, p. 401.

Agent and Client—Statute 37 and 38 Vict. c. 94 (Conveyancing Scotland Act 1874), sec. 4.

3. When a casualty becomes due the superior's agent is not entitled to record at the vassal's expense in the superior's chartulary the disposition by the recording of which the vassal obtained an entry. Magistrates of Edinburgh v. Whitehead, &c., May 18, 1876, p. 663.

Feu-Contract—Conditions—Minerals.

4. A feu-contract, in which the superior reserved the minerals, and bound himself to pay any damage caused to buildings by working them, contained a stipulation that the vassal should not erect any other building than cottages, to be used as dwelling-houses, with suitable office-houses. The vassal having built a house of two stories, held that the superior had sufficient interest to enforce implement of the condition, and the vassal ordained to take down the house, in so far as it exceeded one square storey and attics. Naismith v. Cairnduff, June 21, 1876, p. 863.

Conditions—Plan.

5. A feu-contract provided that the buildings to be erected should consist of cottages, with suitable offices, "which cottages shall not exceed four in number, and shall be built on the sites shewn on the plan, and shall front to the north, and shall each of them be in point of size and accommodation as well as architectural character, at least equal to either of the two cottages which have been already erected." Held, in a question between the superior and vassal, that the feu-contract was not to be construed as restricting the vassal to the precise limits of the building sites shewn on the plan. Naismith v. Cairnduff, June 21, 1876, p. 863.

See Minerals, 1—Property, 4—Public Burden.

TEINDS. Augmentation—Value of Glebe Feu-Duties.

1. In an application by a minister for augmentation of stipend, held that the revenue derived from portions of the glebe feued under the Glebe Lands (Scotland) Act, 1866, was not to be taken into account in determining whether or not an augmentation should be granted. Minister v. Heritors of Kilmalcolm, Oct. 25, 1875, p. 32.

Augmentation—Decimæ inclusæ.

2. In an augmentation the minister condescended upon free teind arising from several different parcels of lands. Only one of the heritors objected to the condescendence, and on the ground that he held his lands under a title cum decimis inclusis, and craved that the process should be sisted that the minister might bring a declarator to try the validity of the objector's decimæ inclusæ right. Held that as there was free teind apart from that of the objecting heritor the minister was entitled to an augmentation, and that the objection of the individual heritor would fall to be disposed of in the locality. Minister of Borthwick v. Dundas, Jan. 17, 1876, p. 361.

TESTAMENT. See Foreign, 1.

TITLE TO SUE. Proving of the Tenor.

Where a pursuer was unable to recover deeds constituting his title to sue, held that it was necessary for him to bring an action of proving of the tenor before the action could proceed. Shaw v. Shaw's Trustees, June 13, 1876, p. 813.

TRAMWAYS. See Statute.

TRUST. Charitable Bequest.

1. A testator left £500 to the kirk-session of a parish, the interest of which he directed to be applied to the relief of such poor persons, natives of the parish, as the kirk-session should consider to be proper objects of such aid, but who had never received relief from the poor-funds, "declaring that the minister and elders constituting the kirk-session" "shall be perpetual patrons of the said sum, and shall have the sole power of naming the said individuals." Held that the kirk-session was entitled to depute the duty of selecting the objects of the charity to the minister. Turbyne v. Kirk-Session of Leuchars, Oct. 15, 1875, p. 10.

Indefinite Payments.

2. Where a trustee, holding two different funds for the same beneficiary, makes indefinite payments to the beneficiary, without fixing at the time from which fund the payments come, the incidence and legal effect of the payments are not to be determined by the arbitrary choice of the trustee, but the payments must be equitably apportioned between the two funds according to legal rules, if the trustee has a balance in his hands from both, or, if not, they must be held to have been made from that fund in which he had a balance in hand at the time. Beith v. Mackenzie, Nov. 30, 1875, p. 185.

Power to Feu—Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867, sec. 3.

3. A truster, who died in 1825, left the residue of his estate to be applied for behoof of a grammar school, and directed his trustees to let a park belonging to the trust-estate annually or on lease for a period not exceeding seven years, "declaring that my said park shall never be sold or disposed of." In a petition by the trustees for authority to feu the park, held that the Court could not grant authority to feu, as that was contrary to the truster's intention as expressed in the trust-deed. Anderson, &c., May 13, 1876, p. 639.

Prescription—Mortification—Act 1696, c. 25.

4. By deed of mortification the granter assigned certain sums to the town-council of a burgh to be invested and the proceeds applied towards the maintenance of a professor in a university. The funds were invested in land, which were managed for many years by the master of mortifications, an officer of the corporation, in whose name the title was taken. Afterwards the town-council appointed a portion of the lands, including a strip of land on the sea-coast, to be exposed for sale by public roup. The subjects were sold for payment of a feu-duty, and to a person who afterwards declared that he had purchased on behalf of the treasurer of the town, and the latter was infeft upon charter in his favour for behoof of the magistrates, council, and community. Soon afterwards the town-council, upon a representation that they were proprietors of the ground, obtained from the Crown a grant of the salmon-fishings ex adverso of the strip of land. In an action of declarator brought more than forty years afterwards by the university, with concurrence of two professors interested in the mortification, held (1) that the town-council still held the lands in trust for the mortification, and that they could plead no prescriptive right against the trust; (2) that, having acquired the fishings in the character of proprietors of the trust-property, they were bound to communicate the benefit to the trust, and hold them for behoof of the trust; (3) that the consent and concurrence of the two professors gave the university a sufficient title and interest to sue for arrears.

TRUST—Continued.

Observations (per Lord Deas) on Trust Act, 1696, c. 25. University of Aberdeen v. Magistrates of Aberdeen, July 18, 1876, p. 1087.

See Entail, 1—Expenses, 4—School, 6—Succession.

WARRANDICE. See Sale, 4, 5, 6.

WRIT. Subscription.

1. Held that it did not invalidate the subscription of the maker of a deed that he was assisted by having his hand held about the wrist, the hand not having been led in the formation of the letters. Noble v. Noble, Nov. 5, 1875, p. 74.

Notarial Execution—Docquet.

2. Held that the 41st section of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, does not prescribe the use of the form in schedule (I), but merely suggests it as a good form, and that therefore a notarial docquet which was otherwise sufficient was not rendered invalid by its disconformity to the schedule. Atchison's Trustees v. Atchison, Jan. 21, 1876, p. 388.

Attesting Witnesses.

3. The Conveyancing and Land Transfer (Scotland) Act, 1874, sec. 39, enacts that "no deed, instrument, or writing subscribed by the granter or maker thereof, and bearing to be attested by two witnesses subscribing, and whether relating to land or not, shall be deemed invalid or denied effect according to its legal import because of any informality of execution." Held that the clause did not apply to a case where the signatures of witnesses bearing to attest the subscription of the granter of a deed were adhibited before the subscription of the granter, and where the witnesses neither saw the granter sign nor heard him acknowledge his subscription. Smyth v. Smyth, March 9, 1876, p. 573.

Authentication—Conveyancing and Land Transfer (Scotland) Act, sec. 39.

4. Held that a writing consisting of more than one sheet, and bearing the name of the alleged granter by way of subscription on the last page only, along with the names of two attesting witnesses, may be proved by evidence prout de jure to be a "deed, instrument, or writing subscribed by the granter or maker" within the meaning of the 39th section of the Conveyancing Act, 1874. M'Laren v. Menzies, July 20, 1876, p. 1151.

See Mandate.

CASES DECIDED IN THE REGISTRATION APPEAL COURT.

DEFEASIBLE TITLE. See Valuation-Roll.

POOR-RATES. Notice by Collector of non-payment—31 and 32 Vict. c. 48, secs. 6 and 18.

A voter's name was struck off the roll for non-payment of poor-rate, in terms of sec. 6 of the Reform Act, 1868. No notice had been given him in the form of schedule C, referred to in sec. 18 of the Act, nor had any "demand-note" been served upon him in terms of that section, except that he had received on 5th February the usual notice of assessment to the effect he had been assessed in a certain sum, and that it was payable on 16th February. Held that the notice of assessment was sufficient to satisfy the requirement of the 18th section of the statute, and that the name had been rightly struck off the roll. Mackenzie v. King, Nov. 1, 1875, p. 8.

SUCCESSIVE QUALIFICATIONS. Burgh Franchise.

1. Held that occupancy, as tenant, of one house in a burgh, combined with occupancy, in immediate succession, as owner, of another house in the same burgh, gave a qualification for the burgh franchise when the combined occupancy extended over the requisite period. Hannah v. Dodds, Nov. 1, 1875, p. 7.

County Franchise.

2. Held that the successive ownership of different premises, and merely civil possession during the requisite period, did not afford a qualification for a vote in a county. Learmont v. Young, Nov. 1, 1875, p. 5.

VALUATION-ROLL. County Franchise—17 and 18 Vict. c. 91, sec. 34.

Ailsa Craig was let for £30 a-year to two joint tenants, with a cottage thereon, which was worth £7, 10s. a-year, together with the right to kill wild fowls, wild goats, and rabbits, under certain restrictions as to quantity and seasons. There was reserved to the landlord full right, without any qualification and without compensation, "to shoot, kill, and carry away fowls, goats, and rabbits" from the Craig. Ailsa Craig was totally incapable of agricultural occupation. It was entered in the valuation-roll as land, value £30 a-year, and the tenants were each entered as voters on the assessor's list as "joint tenant, land, Ailsa Rock." Held that the valuation-roll was conclusive; and objections,—that the accessory right not being heritable, its value must be deducted, and that the landlord's reserved right was such as to give him control over the value, and therefore over the qualification to vote,—repelled. Girvan v. Campbell, Nov. 1, 1875, p. 1.

CASES DECIDED IN THE COURT OF JUSTICIARY.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE. Trespass—Question of Civil Right.

In a criminal prosecution before a Justice of Peace Court, for fishing for salmon without leave of the proprietor, the accused admitted having fished for salmon on the day and at the place libelled, but maintained that as a member of the community of Perth he had a right to fish at the place libelled, and in support of his contention produced a copy, admitted to be correct, of a royal charter in favour of the citizens of Perth, and offered to prove that possession had followed upon the charter of the right to fish for salmon at the place libelled from the date of the charter to the present period. The Justices convicted the accused. Held, that a question of civil right being involved, the Justices should have either sisted procedure or dismissed the complaint,—and the conviction quashed. Barlas v. Chalmers, April 4, 1876, p. 26.

APPEAL.

There is no appeal to the House of Lords from judgments of the Court of Justiciary. Mackintosh v. Lord Advocate, March 23, 1876, H. L., p. 24.

BAIL. Furtum grave—Statute 1701, c. 6.

1. Held that the crime of stealing from the person "a gold or other metal watch," aggravated by two previous convictions of theft was a capital crime, and therefore not bailable, under the Act 1701, c. 6, on the mere demand of the accused. Wilson v. Lord Advocate, Oct. 20, 1875, p. 1.

Furtum grave

2. Petition to be admitted to bail refused, in respect that the crime charged was a furtum grave, and therefore capital, and that the Lord Advocate had refused his consent to bail being accepted. Wilson v. Lord Advocate, Oct. 20, 1875, p. 1.

Crime—Breach of Trust or Theft.

3. A prisoner was committed on a charge of breach of trust or alternatively of theft, based upon the allegation that he had been employed by a person to uplift money and apply it to a particular purpose, and that he had not so applied it, but had appropriated it to his own use. Bail having been refused by the Crown, the prisoner applied to the Court to be admitted to bail, on the ground that the petition on which the warrant of commitment had been granted did not set forth facts which constituted theft, but only breach of trust, and that the charge of theft had been added simply to deprive him of the benefit of being admitted to bail. Held that the facts alleged might either fall within the category of breach of trust or theft, according to the circumstances, and petition refused. Wormald v. Lord Advocate, Dec. 3, 1875, p. 13.

EXPENSES.

Observations (per Lord Deas) on awarding and modifying expenses in appeals to the Court of Justiciary. M'Intyre v. Linton, July 21, 1876, p. 41.

FISHINGS. See Administration of Justice—Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act.

HARBOURS, DOCKS, AND PIERS CLAUSES ACT (10 Vict. c. 27), secs. 81 and 82.

In virtue of their powers under the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, which is incorporated in the Greenock Port and Harbours Act, 1866, the Greenock Harbour Trustees appointed and licensed a sufficient number of persons as weighers within the limits of the port and harbour of Greenock. By the 82d section of the first-mentioned Act it is provided that where a sufficient number of meters and weighers have been appointed by the trustees, masters of vessels and owners of goods discharged at the port shall not employ any person other than a weigher or meter licensed by "the trustees, or appointed by the Commissioners of Customs to weigh or measure the same," and if in such case any person other than a meter or weigher, licensed by the trustees or appointed by the Commissioners of Customs, shall weigh or measure any such goods as aforesaid, such person, as well as the person by whom he shall be employed, shall incur a penalty. Held that the object of the provision was to exclude the employment for hire of unlicensed weighers, but not to prevent merchants and others weighing their own cargoes by the hands of their own clerks. Nicol v. M'Callum, June 30, 1876, p. 34.

HARBOURS, DOCKS, AND PIERS CLAUSES ACT—Continued.

INDICTMENT. Relevancy—Fraud—Insolvency—Putting away Goods to defraud Creditors.
1. Held that an indictment which charged in the major premise "fraud, particularly the wickedly, fraudulently, and feloniously putting away, carrying off, or secreting by an insolvent or other debtor, of his funds or effects, with intent to defraud his creditors," was not relevant, by reason of the interjection of the words "or other" between "insolvent" and "debtor." Clendinnen v. Rodger, Dec. 2, 1875, p. 3.

Theft—Relevancy.
2. In an indictment charging alternatively theft and breach of trust, it was stated in that part of the minor which related to the charge of theft that the panel, being a law-agent, and having been entrusted by a client to uplift a sum belonging to him, deposited in bank, for the special purpose of investing the same in heritable security, did then steal and theftuously away take the said sum. Held that this was a relevant charge of theft. Lord Advocate v. Wormald, March 27, 1876, p. 24.

Relevancy—Day Trespass Act, 2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 68, sec. 1.
3. The Day Trespass Act, 2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 68, sec. 1, makes it an offence to "commit any trespass by entering or being in the daytime upon any land, without leave of the proprietor, in search or pursuit of game," &c. Held that a general conviction proceeding upon a complaint which charged the panel with having in the daytime committed a trespass, "by entering or being without leave of the proprietor in and near to a field on the farm of K" in pursuit of game," could not be sustained. Arthur v. Peebles, June 30, 1876, p. 38.

POLICE. General Police and Improvement Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 101), sec. 130.
Held that the 130th section of the General Police and Improvement Act, 1862, which required "owners of common stairs," &c., to make, on the requisition of the Police Commissioners, "provisions for lighting such common stair," &c. "in a suitable manner, and for that purpose to provide and erect all necessary lamps, and alter, repair, and renew the same," did not impose on the owners the duty of supplying gas or other illuminating substance. Stewart v. Edwards, Dec. 8, 1875, p. 14.

PROCESS. Suspension—Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, 38 and 39 Vict. c. 62, secs. 3 and 9.
A having been convicted in the Sheriff Court on a summary complaint, applied to the Sheriff, under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, sec. 3, to state and sign a case for appeal. After the case was prepared by the Sheriff-clerk in terms of the statute, but before it was adjusted and signed by the Sheriff, A lodged a minute withdrawing his application for a case. He afterwards brought a suspension of the Sheriff's judgment. Held that he had not appealed in the sense of that and the 9th section of the Act, and that the suspension was not excluded. Kay v. Kelso Local Authority, June 30, 1876, p. 40.

PUBLIC-HOUSE. Public-House Certificate, breach of—Public-Houses Acts Amendment Act, 1862, schedule (A), No. 2.

1. In an appeal against a conviction for breach of a public-house certificate by selling exciseable liquor to a child "apparently under fourteen years of age," held that though there would be no breach of certificate committed by supplying liquor to such child when he is a messenger for an adult, yet the publican is not entitled to assume, without inquiring and satisfying himself, that the child is the messenger of an adult. Donaldson v. Linton, Dec. 8, 1875, p. 16.

Certificate—9 Geo. IV. c. 58, secs. 19 and 21.

2. A tenant of an hotel obtained in February 1876 a transfer of the certificate for the sale of exciseable liquors granted to his predecessor for the year from 15th May 1875 to 15th May 1876, and at a licensing Court held on 11th April 1876, the magistrates granted him a new certificate from 15th May 1876 to 15th May 1877. Upon 4th May 1876 he was convicted of having on Sunday, 23d April, sold exciseable liquors to persons not being lodgers or travellers, and his certificate was adjudged to be void and null from the date of the conviction. Held that the forfeiture was not applicable to the transferred certificate, under which the hotel-keeper was then trading, and did not affect the new certificate, which was only to come into force upon 15th May 1876, and that therefore a conviction against him for selling exciseable liquor in July 1876 without a certificate was bad. M'Intyre v. Linton, July 21, 1876, p. 41.

RUNNING LETTERS. Crime—Criminal Letters.

A person was apprehended on 30th October, and committed to prison on 6th November 1875, on a charge of theft. On 18th December the prisoner obtained letters of intimation, which were intimated to the Crown on 20th December 1875. On 17th February 1876 the prisoner was served with an indictment citing him before the High Court of Justiciary on 28th March, these dates being respectively the fifty-ninth and ninety-ninth days from the date of the prisoner commencing to run his letters. On the averment that he had been already four months in prison, and that he believed it was not the intention of the Crown to proceed to trial on the 28th March 1876, but to apply for warrant to serve criminal letters on him under 1701, c. 6, and try him at the Dundee Spring Circuit Court, the petitioner craved the Court, before granting warrant for serving criminal letters upon him, to appoint him to appear and shew cause why such warrant should not be granted.

Petition refused—and observed that even if the petitioner had made out a case of hardship the Court would not interfere with the issuing of criminal letters, but would only require the Crown to give notice to the petitioner before a warrant of recommitment was applied for with a view to the service of the letters. Simpson v. Lord Advocate, March 4, 1876, p. 22.

SALMON FISHERIES ACT, 1844. See Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875.

SMALL DEBT ACT. Process—Jurisdiction—Small Debt Act (1 Vict. c. 41).

Held that it is competent for the Sheriff in the Small Debt Court to entertain an action by an inspector of poor for recovery of payments of aliment to a pauper not exceeding £12, notwithstanding that it may be necessary to determine incidentally the question of the pauper's settlement. Nixon v. Caldwell, June 1, 1876, p. 31.

STATUTE. See Harbours, &c., Act.

SUMMARY PROSECUTIONS APPEALS ACT, 1875. Crime—Contravention of Salmon Fisheries Act, 1844 (7 and 8 Vict. c. 95).

A fisherman was charged with a contravention of the Salmon Fisheries Act, 1844, sec. 1, by unlawfully and wilfully taking, fishing for, or attempting to take sea-trout by means of set lines. It was stated in defence, that, finding sea-trout upon lines which, as he averred, he had baited and set for flounders in a bay or estuary of the sea frequented by both kinds of fish, he had appropriated them. He was acquitted by the Sheriff after evidence led. In an appeal under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, at the instance of the prosecutor, held that the question whether the respondent had wilfully taken the fish, in contravention of the statute, was one of fact for the inferior Judge; that there was no question of law for the Court; and appeal dismissed. Grant v. Wright, May 31, 1876, p. 28.

SUMMARY PROSECUTIONS APPEALS ACT, 1875—Continued.

TRESPASS. Poaching—Day Trespass Act, 1832 (2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 68), sec. 1—Person residing with Tenant.
1. Held that a person who resided with his sister on a farm of which she was tenant, and who assisted her in the management thereof without remuneration except his board, was not, as regarded the said farm, protected from the operation of the Day Trespass Act by reason of the provision in the first section thereof, which allows a person charged with a trespass to prove, by way of defence, any matter which would have been a defence to an action at law for such trespass. Black v. Bradshaw, Dec. 16, 1875, p. 18.
See Indictment.
Game—Day Trespass Act, 2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 68—Trespass—Rabbits—Tenant's Power of delegating right to kill Rabbits.
2. The tenant of a farm, who resided at a distance, put his daughter and her husband into the farm to manage it. Held that the rabbits not being reserved to the landlord, the tenant was entitled to authorise his son-in-law to kill rabbits, and that the son-in-law was, in virtue of the tenant's authority, exempted from the provisions of the Day Trespass Act. M'Adam v. Laurie, March 1, 1876, p. 20.

PRINTED BY GEORGE ROBB (SUCCESSOR TO JOHN HUGHES), THISTLE STREET, EDINBURGH.

Stanford Law Library
3 6105 062 687 368